Sec. 11. When any local board of health are of the opinion that the cleansing and disinfection of any house, building, car, vessel or vehicle, or any part thereof, and of any articles therein likely to retain infection, would tend to prevent or check infectious disease, it shall be the duty of such authority to give notice in writing to the owner or occupier of such house, vessel or vehicle, or part thereof, requiring him to cleanse and disinfect such house, vessel or vehicle and the said articles within a time specified in said notice. If the person to whom notice is so given fails to comply therewith he shall be liable to a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars nor more than one hundred dollars for every day during which he continues to make default, and said board shall cause such house, vessel or vehicle and articles to be cleansed and disinfected, and may recover the expenses incurred and said fine and costs of prosecution in a civil action before any justice of the peace or court having jurisdiction in like cases, which sum when recovered shall be placed to the credit of a special fund for the purposes of said local board of health [to be used] by said board for general expenses. Provided, that where the owner or occupier of any such house, vessel, or vehicle is from poverty or otherwise unable in the opinion of said local board effectually to carry out the requirements of said board in said notice, such authority may, without enforcing such requirements on such owner or occupier, with his consent, cleanse and disinfect such premises and articles and defray the expenses thereof.

Sec. 12. Any local board may direct the destruction of any bed or bedding, clothing, clothing, carpets or other articles which have been exposed to infection from contact with infected persons or articles, and may allow compensation for the same, or may provide a proper place, with all necessary apparatus and attendance for the disinfection of such articles and may cause any articles brought for disinfection to be disinfected thereby, and said board may provide and maintain when necessary a carriage or carriages suitable for the conveyance of such articles or of persons suffering under any infectious disorder, and may pay the expense of conveying therein any person so suffering to a hospital or other place of destination.

Sec. 13. Where any suitable hospital or place for the reception of the sick is provided within the district of any local board, or within a convenient distance of such district, any person who is suffering from any dangerous infectious disorder and is without proper lodging or accommodation, or lodged in a room occupied by more than one family, or is on board any vessel, cars or other vehicle, may, on a certificate signed by a qualified medical practitioner, or the executive officer of said board, and with the consent of the superintending body of such hospital or place, be removed by order of any justice to such hospital or place at the cost of the local district; and any person so suffering, who is lodged in any common lodging or boarding house, may, with the like consent and on a like certificate, be so removed by order of the local board. An order under this section may be addressed to such constable or officer as the justice or local authority making the same may think expedient, and any person who wilfully disobeys or obstructs the execution of said order shall be liable to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars, to be recovered on criminal complaint, and the same so recovered shall be paid over to said board for general expenses thereof.

Sec. 14. The State board of health may, by order, require any two or more local boards to act together for the purposes of the provisions of this act, for the prevention of epidemic diseases.

Sec. 15. When any person coming from abroad, or residing in any town, village, borough or city within this State, is infected, or lately has been infected, with the small pox or other contagious disease dangerous to the public health, the board of health of the town, village, borough or city where such sick or infected person is, may immediately cause such person to be removed to a separate house, if it can be done without danger to his health, and shall provide for such person or persons, nurses, medical attendance and other necessaries, which shall be [a] charge[d] in favor of such town, village, borough or city upon the person so provided for, his parents, guardian or master, if able; otherwise upon the county in which he has a legal settlement, or upon the State, if said person be a non-resident of the State, and has no property within the State; in which latter case the bills for such expenses shall be paid only after being audited and approved by the State board of health and by the governor, and said bills shall be allowed only on condition that the local board of health shall have promptly, on the appearance of such disease, notified the State board of health thereof, and shall have followed the instructions and regulations of said State board given with respect to the care and expense in the case or cases in reference to which said bills were incurred, and further shall file satisfactory evidence to said State board that such person or persons were non-residents of the State and have no property within the same. The town, village, borough, or city, as the case may be, may recover in a civil action against the person or persons or the county chargeable under this section.

Sec. 16. If such infected person cannot be removed without danger to his health, the board of health shall make provision as directed in the preceding section for such person in the house where he may be, and in such case they may cause the persons in the neighborhood to be removed, and [may take such other measures as they] may deem necessary for the safety of the inhabitants.

Sec. 17. When a disease dangerous to the public health breaks out the board shall immediately provide such hospital or place of reception for the sick and infected as is judged best for their accommodation and the safety of the inhabitants, which shall be subject to the regulations of the board: and the board may cause any sick and infected persons to be removed thereto, unless his condition will not admit of such removal without danger to his health, in which case the house or place where he remains shall be considered as a hospital, and, with all its inmates, subject to the regulations of the board.

Sec. 18. It shall be the duty of all local boards of health, whenever they are informed that there is a case of small pox, scarlet fever, diphtheria or other infectious or contagious disease, within the territory over which it has jurisdiction, to immediately examine into the facts of the case, and, if the disease appears to be of the character above specified, they shall adopt such quarantine and sanitary measures as may in their judgment tend to prevent the spread of said disease in its locality, subject to be modified by the State board of health, and shall immediately notify the secretary of said State board of the appearance of such disease and the measures adopted by said local board in relation thereto.

Sec. 19. And said boards of health shall have power to forbid, by notices posted upon the entrances to premises where there may be a patient sick with such disease, any person except the medical attendants and spiritual advisers, from going to or leaving said premises without their permission, or carrying, or causing to be carried, any material whereby said disease may be conveyed, until after said disease has abated and the premises, dwelling and clothing have been rendered free from disease by such disinfecting means as the board may direct; and if said board shall be informed that the above, or any reasonable or sanitary measures which they have adopted and made public, is or has been violated, then the said board may cause said offender against this act to be apprehended and brought before an officer having jurisdiction; and said offender shall, upon conviction, be liable to a fine in the sum of not less than five dollars ($5) nor more than twenty-five dollars ($25) for any violation under this act. Any member of any board of health who shall neglect his duties under the provisions of this act, shall be liable, upon conviction in a court having competent jurisdiction, to be fined in a sum not less than twenty-five dollars ($25) nor more than one hundred dollars ($100) for the first offense; and for conviction for violation of this act the second time, shall, in addition to the fines already provided, become disqualified from holding the office of, or to which is attached the duties of, a member of a board of health.

Sec. 20. All fines collected under this act shall be placed to the credit of a special fund of the city, village or town in which the offense is committed for the use and expenses of said board. That every physician shall report to the local board of health, in writing, every person having a contagious disease, and the state of his or her disease, and his or her place of dwelling, and name if known, which such physician has prescribed for or attended for the first time since having a contagious disease, or since the discovery of the same to be contagious, during any part of the preceding twenty-four hours: but not more than two (2) reports shall be required in one (1) week concerning the same person; but every attending physcian thereat must see that such report is or has been made by some attending physician.

Sec. 21. That it shall be the duty of each and every practicing physician in this State to report in writing to the local board of health the death of any of his patients who shall have died of contagious or infectious disease, within twenty-four hours thereafter, and to state in such report the specified [specific] name and type of such disease.

Sec. 22. That every keeper of any private house, boarding-house or lodging-house, and every inn keeper and hotel keeper shall, within twenty-four hours, report in writing to the local board of health the same particulars required of any physician in the preceding section, concerning any person being at any of the aforesaid houses and hotels, and attacked with any contagious disease dangerous to the public health.

Sec. 23. That it shall be the duty of every person knowing of any person sick of any contagious disease dangerous to the public health, and the duty of every physician hearing of any such sick person, who he shall have reason to think requires the attention of the local board; to at once report the facts to the board in regard to the disease, condition and dwelling place or position of such sick person.

Sec. 24. That no person shall, within the limits of any town, city or village within this State, without a permit from the local or State board of health, carry or remove from one building to another, or from a vessel to the shore, or any railway cars, any person sick of any contagious disease, or the body of any person having died of contagious disease; nor shall any person, by any exposure of any individual sick of any contagious disease or of the body of such person, or by any negligent act connected therewith, or in respect to the care and custody thereof, or by a needless exposure of himself, cause, or contribute to or promote the spread of disease from any such person or from any dead body.

Sec. 25. That every person being the parent or guardian, or having the care, custody or control, of any minor or other person, shall, to the extent of any means, power or authority of said parent, guardian or other person, that could properly be used or exerted for such purpose, cause and procure such minor or person under control to be so promptly, frequently and effectively vaccinated that such minor or individual should not take, or be liable to take, the small pox.

Sec. 26. That no principal, superintendent or teacher of any school, and no parent, master or guardian of any child or minor, having the power and authority to prevent, shall permit any child or minor having scarlet fever, diphtheria, small pox, or any dangerous, infectious or contagious disease, or any child residing in any house in which any such disease exists, or has recently existed, to attend any public or private school until the board of health of the town, village, borough or city shall have given its permission therefor; nor in any manner to be unnecessarily exposed, or to needlessly expose any other person to the taking or to the infection of any contagious disease.

Sec. 27. That no person shall allow to be retained unburied the dead body of any human being for a longer time than four days, or where death has been caused by a contagious disease for a longer time than twenty-four hours after the death of such person, without a permit from the local board of health, which permit shall specify the length of time during which such body may be retained unburied; and when death has been caused by a contagious disease the body shall, if directed by said board, be immediately disinfected in such manner as may be directed by said board and enclosed in a tightly sealed coffin, which shall not thereafter be opened, and the funeral of such person shall be strictly private, and in the removal thereof for burial or otherwise hearses or such other vehicles as may be authorized by said board only shall be employed.

Sec. 28. Said boards of health may employ all such persons as shall be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act and the regulations duly established by said boards as herein provided, any may fix their compensation. The said boards shall have power to employ physicians and provide necessaries for persons in cases of poverty and generally to pay such expenses as are necessarily incurred by them in taking precautions which they may deem necessary to the public health.

Sec. 29. All expenses so incurred by any town or village board of health, heretofore or hereafter, shall, in the first instance, be borne and paid out of the town or village treasury, as the case may be, by orders on the treasurer thereof issued by said board, and payable out of the special fund herein mentioned, if sufficient, if not, out of the general fund. The proper authorities of villages and towns shall certify the amount required to reimburse said general funds, to the county auditor at the time of certifying other taxes, and such auditor shall extend on the tax list of the county a tax sufficient to pay the amount so certified, which tax shall be collected as other taxes and paid over to said town or village treasurer as the case may be.

Sec. 30. Any person who shall wilfully violate any of the provisions of this act, or of any regulations duly made and published by any of the boards of health herein mentioned—the penalty for which is not herein specifically provided for—shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to a fine not to exceed one hundred dollars ($100) or imprisonment not to exceed thirty (30) days, or both such fine and imprisonment. All amounts so collected shall be paid to the town, village or city treasurer, and placed to the credit of a special fund for the purposes and expenses of the said local boards of health.

Sec. 31. This act shall be in force from and after its passage, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Approved March 3, 1883.

98.

AN ACT for the preservation of life and the protection of travelers.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. The proprietors and lessees of all buildings of two or more stories in height, used or occupied as tenements, lodging rooms, boarding houses, hotels, public halls, or places of amusement, schools, seminaries, hospitals, asylums, workhouses, jails or manufactories, shall provide for and equip said buildings with such protection against fire and escape from said buildings as shall be hereinafter set forth in this bill.

Sec. 2. The classification of buildings shall be as follows:

First—Hotels of two (2) stories in height with ten (10) or more sleeping rooms.

Second—Hotels or lodging rooms of three (3) or more stories in height.

Third—Tenements or boarding houses of three (3) or more stories in height, occupied by one (1) or more families, consisting of more than twenty (20) persons. Provided, a mansard roof or attic when used as sleeping rooms shall be counted as one story.

Fourth—Buildings used as opera houses, theaters or public halls, of a seating capacity exceeding three hundred (300).

Fifth—Public school buildings, seminaries, academies and colleges more than two stories in height.

Sixth—Hospitals and asylums of two (2) or more stories in height.

Seventh—Jails, workhouses or other prisons for confinement of persons under sentence of crime or misdemeanor.

Eighth—Manufactories over two (2) stories in height, employing above the first (1st) story more than twenty-five (25) persons.

Section 3. Provides for the appliances to be used, as follows:

Buildings under classification one (1) of section two (2) of this act.—Each two thousand five hundred (2,500) superficial feet of area or fractional part thereof covered by said building shall be provided with either an inside stand pipe of not less than one and one-quarter (1¼) inches inside diameter, with hose connection and hose of sufficient length always attached, in the hall into which the sleeping-rooms open, and this stand pipe supplied by means of connection with public or private water works, which will furnish sufficient pressure: or one (1) chemical fire extinguisher kept near the public stairway or other convenient locality in the hallway, always charged ready for use.

Buildings under classification two (2)—For each six thousand (6,000) superficial feet of area, covered by said building, shall be provided with either an inside stand pipe of not less than one and three-quarters (1¾) inches inside diameter, and sufficient hose connected with it, of not less than one and one-quarter (1¼) inches inside diameter, on each floor, and furnished with a constant water pressure by water works, or by a steam pump which can be put in action at [a] moment's notice: or for six thousand (6,000) superficial feet of area covered by said building there shall be one (1) two and one-half (2½) inch (or larger) metallic stand pipe with metallic ladder attached above the first (1st) story located upon the outside of the wall and extending above the roof and so situated as to give access to or exit from each story and roof above the first (1st), arranged with valves and male hose connections at each story above the first (1st) and roof, and with single or double female hose connection at base of pipe so that engine hose can be attached from street, the hose couplings to conform to the size and pattern used by the fire department where located. There shall also be provided for each eight thousand and five hundred (8,500) superficial feet of area, or fractional part thereof, covered by said building, at least one (1) chemical fire extinguisher on each floor occupied as sleeping apartments. Provided, that hotels where every three thousand and five hundred (3,500) superficial feet is protected by stand pipe and hose, as set forth in this act, there only one (1) chemical fire extinguisher shall be required on each floor occupied as sleeping apartments. In case the stand pipe and hose first mentioned is not practicable, for want of water works or steam to work pumps, then, in addition to the extinguisher provided for, there shall be placed in each hallway of floors used as sleeping rooms, for each two thousand five hundred (2,500) superficial feet of area one (1) barrel of water with two (2) pails with the words "For Fire Purposes Only" painted thereon. Each sleeping apartment above the second (2d) story shall be furnished with a rope or any other practical fire escape of sufficient length to reach the ground. A red light shall be kept burning all night, located at the head of each stairway above the first (1st) floor; also one (1) on each floor above the first (1st) at or near the exit to the stationary fire escape, if any. The following printed notice shall be posted in a conspicuous place in each sleeping room above the first (1st) floor: "Exit in Case of Fire—Upon leaving this room turn to the (right or left) and by passing (give number of feet) feet you will reach a red light, which indicates (stairway or fire escape.)"

Buildings under classification three (3) of section two (2) of this act shall have for each five thousand (5,000) superficial feet of area covered by said building, at least one (1) outside stand pipe two and one-half (2½) inches or larger, as provided for in classification two (2), and at least one (1) non-combustible ladder or ladder or stairway for each twenty (20) persons occupying said building above the first (1st) story.

Buildings under classification four (4) of section two (2) of this act, shall be provided with at least one (1) stand pipe running to the stage and furnished with hose always connected and of sufficient length to reach all parts of the stage; also, with a chemical fire extinguisher always charged and placed in a convenient place to protect the scenery; or, in case the stand pipe should be impracticable for want of constant water pressure, then the stage shall be provided with two (2) chemical fire extinguishers and at least one (1) barrel of water and (2) two pails with the words "for fire purposes only" painted thereon. It is provided, however, that this shall not apply to halls where no stage with curtains or scenery is used; and all buildings under this classification shall have such number of exits of such area, and such number of non-combustible stairways, ladders or fire escapes, as the mayor, chief engineer of fire department and chief of police of any city, or president of any town or village council, chief engineer or fire warden, and chief of police or constable of any town or village, or a majority of them, may from time to time determine.

Buildings under classification five (5) of section two (2) shall be provided, where practicable, with inside stand pipe, as provided in classification two (2) or an outside stand pipe, as provided in same classification; also one (1) chemical fire extinguisher on each floor above the first (1st); there shall also be provided such number of exits of such area, and such number of non-combustible ladders or stairways as the persons named in classification four (4), or a majority of them, may determine.

Buildings under classification six (6) of section two (2) shall be provided for in the same manner as those under head of classification five (5).

Buildings under classification seven (7) of section two (2) shall be provided with either a stand pipe and sufficient hose connected on each floor with constant water pressure, or shall have a chemical fire extinguisher on each floor. It is provided, however, that this shall not apply to buildings built of stone, brick or iron, with non-combustible partitions and roof practically fire-proof.

Buildings under classification eight (8) of section two (2) of this act, for each two thousand five hundred (2,500) superficial feet of area covered by said building, shall be provided with an inside standpipe of not less than one and one-half (1½) inches diameter, and sufficient hose connected therewith of not less than one and one-quarter (1¼) inches inside diameter, on each floor, and furnished with a constant water pressure by water works or by steam or other pump which can be put in motion at a moment's notice: or for each five thousand (5,000) superficial feet of area covered by said building, there shall be one (1) two and one-half (2½) inch or larger metallic stand-pipe, with metallic ladder attached above the first (1st) story, located and arranged as provided for in classification two (2); also one (1) chemical fire extinguisher located on each floor above the first (1st); there shall also be provided for every forty (40) persons employed above the second (2nd) story one (1) non-combustible stairway, or for every twenty (2) persons one (20) persons one (1) non-combustible ladder located upon the outside of the building, accessible from roof and each story above the first (1st), and reaching to or with twelve (12) feet of the ground or sidewalk; also provides that all standpipes, ladder and non-combustible stairways required by this section shall be provided by the owner or owners of the building, and all other requirements of this section shall be provided by the lessees of such building, unless otherwise agreed upon between the owner or owners and lessees.

Sec. 4. Provides that the chemical fire extinguisher to be used shall be the one in general use in the fire departments, factories and public buildings in the State of Minnesota, and known as the Babcock or Champion portable fire extinguisher.

Sec. 5. It is hereby made the duty of every fire warden, marshal or chief of police of every incorporated town, city, or, where such officers are not provided for, the board of education, directors of school districts and boards of county commissioners, to enforce this act, and any person failing to comply with the provisions of this act within thirty (30) days after being notified by the proper officer in writing, shall pay or forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars, with cost of prosecution of the same, to be enforced by civil action before any competent tribunal, or imprisoned until such fine and costs are paid, not exceeding ninety (90) days; the money arising from such fines to be paid to the use of common schools of the district where such offense shall be committed.

Sec. 6. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after the first (1st) day of July A. D. one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three (1883).

Approved March 2, 1883.

99.

AN ACT to amend an act entitled "an act concerning inn and hotel keepers and landlords, and for the protection of their guests," being chapter fifty-two (52) of the laws of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four (1874.)

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. That section two (2) of chapter fifty-two (52) of the General Laws of eighteen hundred and seventy-four, being an act entitled "an act concerning inn and hotel keepers and landlords and for the protection of their guests, approved March 4, 1874, be amended by striking out the proviso thereof.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Approved March 3, 1883.

100.

AN ACT to prevent setting fire to woods, prairies, or other grounds, and to repeal chapter thirty-six (36) of the General Laws of Minnesota for eighteen hundred and seventy-nine (1879) in relation thereto.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. Whoever wilfully and intentionally or negligently and carelessly sets on fire any woods, prairies or other grounds, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall forfeit and pay a fine of not less than five dollars ($5), nor more than one hundred dollars ($100), together with the costs of prosecution; and, in default of payment thereof, shall be committed to the county jail for not less than thirty (30) days nor more than ninety days (90): but this shall not extend to any person who sets on fire any prairie or other grounds on, or adjoining his own improved farm, inclosure or timber, for the necessary protection thereof from any prairie or other fire which shall be approaching his farm, inclosure or timber and threatening immediate injury thereto; provided that this act shall not be construed to take away any civil remedy which any person may be entitled to for any injury done or received in consequence of any such setting of fire.

Sec. 2. Section three (3), chapter thirty-six (36), of the General Laws of Minnesota for eighteen hundred and seventy-seven (1877), the same being sections sixty-seven (67), sixty-eight (68), sixty-nine (69), seventy (70), seventy-one (71), and seventy-two (72) of the General Statutes of eighteen hundred and seventy-eight (1878), is hereby repealed.

Sec. 3. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved Feb. 8, 1883.

101.

AN ACT to amend sections two (2), sixteen (16) and twenty-two (22), of chapter thirty-nine (39), of the General Statutes of eighteen hundred and seventy-eight (1878), in relation to chattel mortgages.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. That section two (2) of chapter thirty-nine of the General Statutes of eighteen hundred and seventy-eight (1878) be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 2. Every such instrument shall be filed in the town, city or village where the property mortgaged is at the time of the execution of such mortgage, and a copy thereof filed in the town, city or village where the mortgagor, if a resident of this State, resides at the time of the execution thereof. In each town such instrument shall be filed in the office of the town clerk thereof, and in the several cities and villages in the office of the recorder, clerk or other officer in whose custody the records of the city or village are kept, and each of the officers hereinbefore named shall file all such instruments when presented for that purpose, indorse thereon the time of reception, the number thereof, and shall enter in a suitable book to be provided by him at the expense of the town, city or village, with an alphabetical index thereto, under the head of mortgagors and mortgagees respectively, the names of each party to such instrument, and in separate columns opposite such names the number of the instrument, the date, the amount secured thereby, when due and the date of filing the same; such instrument or copy shall remain on file for the inspection of all persons interested."

Sec. 2. That section sixteen (16) of said chapter be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 16. Every such note or other evidence of indebtedness or contract, or a copy thereof, shall be filed in the town, city or village where the vender resides at the time of the making thereof. In each town such instruments shall be filed in the office of the town clerk thereof; and in the several cities and villages, in the office of the recorder, clerk or other officer in whose custody the records are kept; and each of the of the officers hereinbefore named shall file all such instruments when presented for that purpose, endorse thereon the time of reception, the number thereof and shall enter in a suitable book, to be provided by him at the expense of the town, city or village, with an alphabetical index thereto under the head of vendor and vendee respectively, the names of each party to such instrument, and in separate columns opposite such names the number of the instrument, the date, the amount thereof, when due and the date of filing the same; such instrument or copy thereof shall remain on file for the inspection of all persons interested."

Sec. 3. That section twenty-two (22) of said chapter be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec 22. The note, contract or statement, or copy thereof mentioned in section twenty-one (21), of said chapter thirty-nine (39), shall, in order to constitute such lien, be filed in the office of the town clerk of the town, or the clerk or recorder of the city or village in which the borrower resides, or in which the land on which seed is to be sown is situated; and said clerk or recorder shall receive, file, endorse and enter the same in the same manner as is by law required in case of chattel mortgages, and shall receive the same fees therefor; and from the time of filing such note, contract or statement, or copy thereof, the party loaning the seed, or assigns, shall have a valid first claim and lien upon the growing crops and the crops grown from such seed, to the amount and according to the terms of the contract, against all creditors and purchasers as well as against the owner; and such lien shall not be affected by any exemption laws; and the filing aforesaid shall constitute a sufficient notice to all persons of the existence of such lien, but such lien shall cease after one year from the date of filing the same."

Sec. 4. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved Feb. 8, 1883.

102.

AN ACT to establish a state board of corrections and charities for the state of Minnesota.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. The governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint six persons, not more than three of whom shall be from the same political party, who shall constitute a state board of corrections and charities, to serve without compensation, their traveling expenses only being defrayed by the state; two of whom, as indicated by the governor upon their appointment, shall serve for one year, two for two years, and two for three years; and upon the expiration of the term of each, his place, and that of his successor, shall, in like manner, be filled for the term of three years. The governor shall be ex-officio a member of said board and the president thereof. Appointments to fill vacancies caused by death, resignation, or removal before the expiration of such terms may be made for the residue of terms in the same manner as original appointments.

Sec. 2. The state board of corrections and charities shall be provided with a suitable room in the state house. Regular meetings of the board shall be held quarterly, or oftener if required. They may make such rules and orders for the regulation of their own proceedings as they may deem necessary. They shall investigate the whole system of public charities and correctional institutions of the State, examine into the condition and management thereof, especially of prisons, jails, infirmaries, public hospitals, and asylums; and the officers in charge of all such institutions shall furnish to the board, on their request, such information and statistics as they may require; and, to secure accuracy, uniformity, and completeness in such statistics, the board may prescribe such forms of report and registration as they may deem essential; and all plans for new jails and infirmaries shall, before the adoption of the same by the county authorities, be submitted to said board for suggestion and criticism. The governor, in his discretion, may, at any time, order an investigation by the board, or by a committee of its members, of the management of any penal reformatory or charitable institution of the State; and said board, or committee, in making any such investigation, shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths and affirmations; and the report of such investigation, with the testimony, shall be made to the governor, and shall be submitted by him, with his suggestions, to the legislature.

Section 3. The said board may appoint a secretary, who shall be paid for his services, in addition to his traveling expenses, an annual salary of not to exceed twelve hundred dollars, as may be agreed upon by the board. All accounts and expenditures shall be certified, as may be provided by the board, and shall be paid by the State treasurer upon an order from the auditor of State.

Section 4. The State board of corrections and charities shall, every two years, make a full report of all their doings during that period, stating in detail all expenses incurred and showing the actual condition of all the State and county institutions, and making such suggestions as they may deem advisable; of which report one thousand copies shall be printed for the use of the legislature, and five hundred copies for the use of the board.

Section 5. Whenever the governor shall deem it advisable and expedient to obtain information in respect to the condition and practicable workings of charitable, penal, pauper and reformatory institutions in other States, he may authorize and designate any member of said board, or the secretary thereof, to visit such institutions in operation in other States; and by personal inspection to carefully observe and report to said Board on all such matters relating to the conduct and management thereof as may be deemed to be interesting, useful, and of value to be understood in the government and discipline of similar institutions in this State.

Sec. 6. No member of said board, or their secretary, shall be either directly or indirectly interested in any contract for building, repairing, or furnishing any institution, poor house, or jail which by this act they are authorized to visit and inspect; nor shall any officer of such institution, jail, or poor house be eligible to appointment on the board hereby created.

Sec. 7. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 2, 1883.

103.

AN ACT to amend an act entitled "An act to secure proper commitments to the Minnesota State reform school," approved February twenty-six (26), one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two (1872).

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. That whenever any infant under the age of sixteen years shall have been duly convicted in any of the courts of this State of any crime punishable by imprisonment, except of the crime of murder, it shall be the duty of the magistrate before whom such conviction is had, to commit the said infant co [so] convicted to the guardianship of the board of managers of the Minnesota state reform school.

Sec. 2. That no justice of the peace shall have power to commit any infant to said reform school upon a charge of incorrigibility, unless such charge is proved by at least two disinterested witnesses, and no commitment for incorrigibility shall be sufficient to justify the admission of said incorrigible infant into the reform school unless such commitment be approved by the judge of the district court of the district to which the county from which such infant is committed belongs, and no other consent or approval of any officer whatever shall be necessary to authorize the commitment; but in all cases of conviction before a justice of the peace, whether for incorrigibility, or any other crime, the justice shall reduce all the evidence taken by him to writing, and state the name, age and residence of each witness examined, and transmit the same forthwith to the judge of the district court aforesaid, whose duty it shall be to examine the same and approve or disapprove of each conviction. If the conviction of the justice is approved the minor shall forthwith be committed to the said board of managers; if disapproved, no other proceeding shall be had.

Sec. 3. That the children received by said managers, under the conviction of any court within this State, shall be clothed, maintained and instructed by said managers at the public expense of the State. Provided, however, that when such conviction is solely from incorrigibility, then such infant shall be so clothed, maintained and instructed by said managers at the public expense of the proper county from which such infant is sent; and the account of all infants so committed for incorrigibility shall be kept by the managers in an intelligible and proper manner.

Sec. 4. That section six (6) of an act entitled "An act to consolidate the various acts relating to the Minnesota State Reform School, and to amend the same," approved March third (3), one thousand eight hundred and seventy (1870), and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Sec. 5. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 2, 1883.

104.

AN ACT to amend section six (6), chapter fifteen (15), of general statutes of A. D. one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878), relating to relief of the poor.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. Section six (6), of chapter fifteen (15), of the general statutes of A. D. one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following words, to-wit:

Provided further, that if, in the opinion of the county commissioners a limited amount of aid will suffice to enable a person or family who would otherwise have to be sent to the poor house to be self-supporting, they may provide for the partial support of such person or persons in any way which they may deem proper.

Sec. 2. Provided this act shall apply to Goodhue county only.

Sec. 3. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 1, 1883.

105.

AN ACT to amend sections ninety-two (92), ninety-three (93), ninety-four (94) and ninety-five (95) of chapter ninety-five (95) of the General Statutes of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878), relating to burdocks.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota.

Section 1. That sections ninety-two (92), ninety-three (93), ninety-four (94) and ninety-five (95) of the General Statutes of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878) be amended by adding the words "burdock and wild mustard, or burdocks or wild mustard," immediately after the words "Canada thistle or thistles" wherever they shall occur in said sections.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 3, 1883.

106.

AN ACT to repeal an act entitled an act for licensing of dogs and for the protection of sheep, lambs, and other domestic animals.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. That an act entitled an act for the licensing of dogs and for the protection of sheep, lambs and other domestic animals, approved November three (3), one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (1881), the same being chapter eighty-two (82) of the General Laws, passed at the extra session of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (1881), be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 4. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved February 23, 1883.

107.

AN ACT to amend section thirty-four (34) of chapter one (1) of General Statutes of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878), relating to return of votes for members of the legislature.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. That section thirty-four (34) of chapter one (1) of the General Statutes of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878,) relating to return of votes for members of the legislature, be amended as follows, to-wit: By striking out the word "twenty-fifth" in the fifteenth line of said section thirty-four, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty-eight."

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 1, 1883.

108.

AN ACT in relation to the rights and liabilities of owners and lessors, and of lessees and occupants of buildings.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. Tenants need not pay rent in certain cases. The lessees or occupants of any building which shall, without any fault or neglect on their part, be destroyed, or be so injured by the elements, or any other cause, as to be untenantable or unfit for occupancy shall not be liable or bound to pay rent to the lessees or owners thereof after such destruction or injury, unless otherwise expressly provided by written agreement or covenant, and the lessees or occupants may thereupon quit and surrender possession of the leasehold premises, and of the land so leased or occupied.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 2, 1883.

109.

AN ACT to legalize certain conveyances, and the records thereof, of real estate in the State of Minnesota, heretofore executed in other States and Territories of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. That all deeds or conveyances of real estate in this State, heretofore executed in any other State or Territory of the United States, and which is recorded in the office of the register of deeds of the county wherein such land is situated, properly sealed and acknowledged, but with only one subscribing witness, or when executed by more than one person, properly signed and sealed, and witnessed and acknowledged by only one of the parties thereto, the other party or parties, however, having signed and executed a receipt at the end of such deed (as practised in some States), acknowledging the receipt of the consideration expressed in such conveyance, are hereby legalized and made valid and effectual to all intents and purposes; and such instruments, and the record thereof, shall have the same force and effect in all respects as though they had been originally executed and acknowledged in accordance with all the requirements of the statutes of this State, in force at the time of the making or recording of such conveyances. Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall in any manner effect any pending suit or proceeding, or the right or title of any bona fide purchaser, without notice, for a valuable consideration of any such lands so conveyed prior to the passage of this act.

Sec. 2. And this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 2, 1883.

110.

AN ACT to amend chapter ninety-five (95), General Statutes of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878) relating to offenses against property.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. The certain act named in the title hereof, being section seventy-seven (77) and all following sections of chapter one (1), general statutes one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878), the same having been amended since its passage, is hereby further amended as follows, to-wit:

Sec. 2. By adding to section thirty (30) thereof the following, to-wit:

"The said board shall again meet on the Friday and on the Saturday next preceding any general or special election to be held on Tuesday, and on the two days next preceding the day before any special election to be held on any other day in the week (not counting Sunday in any case), in their respective election districts, at the place designated for holding the polls of the election, for the purpose of further revising and correcting said lists and of finally completing the same, and for this purpose they shall meet at twelve (12) o'clock noon and remain in session until ten (10) o'clock in the evening of each of said days."

Sec. 3. By striking from the second (2d) line of section thirty-three (33) thereof the words "within three days thereafter," and inserting in lieu thereof the following, to-wit: "By twelve (12) o'clock noon on the day before the election."

Sec. 4. By so changing the last sentence of said section thirty-three (33), as amended, so that the same shall read as follows, to-wit:

"No vote shall be received at any general or special election, if the name of the person offering to vote, and his place of residence clearly and definitely stated, be not on said register as finally completed and certified to by the board of registry above provided, unless the person offering to vote be personally known to at least one of the judges of election, and unless such person shall furnish to the judges the same affidavits and evidence that he is entitled to vote as is required by this act of a person whose vote is challenged."

Sec. 5. By changing the word "five" (5) found in the fourth (4th) line of section thirty-seven (37) to seven (7).

Sec. 6. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 1, 1883.

112.

AN ACT to amend sections one hundred and twenty-one (121) and one hundred and twenty-two (122) of chapter ten (10) of the General Statutes of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878), pertaining to the duties of board of health and precaution and prevention of scarlatina.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. That sections one hundred and twenty-one (121) and hundred and twenty-two (122) of chapter ten (10) of the General Statutes of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878) be, and the same are hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 121. (Duties of board of health relative to scarlet fever, diphtheria and small pox.)—It shall be the duty of any and every member of all boards of health within this State whenever they are informed that there is a case of scarlet fever, diphtheria or small pox within the territory over which the board of health of which he is a member, has jurisdiction, to notify a majority of such supposed facts within six (6) hours after such information is received by said member of said board, and they shall immediately examine into the facts of the case, and if the disease appears to be scarlet fever, diphtheria or small pox, they shall adopt such quarantine and sanitary measures as may in their judgment tend to prevent the spread of said disease in its locality.

"Sec. 122. (Precautions, preventions, and penalties). And said board of health shall have power to forbid by notices posted upon the entrances to premises where there may be a patient sick with scarlatina, diphtheria or small pox, any person, except the medical attendant and his advisers, from going to or leaving said premises without their permission, or carrying or causing to be carried any material whereby said disease may be conveyed, until said disease has abated, and the premises, dwelling and clothing have been rendered free from disease by such disinfecting means as the board may direct; and if said board shall be informed that the above, or any reasonable and sanitary measures which they have adopted and made public is or has been violated, then the said board may cause said offenders against this act to be apprehended and brought before an officer having jurisdiction, and said offenders shall, upon conviction, be liable to a fine in the sum of not less than five dollars ($5) nor more than twenty-five dollars ($25) for any violation under this act. Any member of any board of health who shall neglect his duties under the provisions of this act shall be liable upon conviction in a court having competent jurisdiction, to be fined in a sum not less than twenty-five dollars ($25) nor more than one hundred dollars ($100) for the first offense, and for conviction for violation of this act the second time, shall, in addition to the fines already provided, become disqualified from holding the office of, or to which is attached the duties of a member of a board of health."

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 2, 1883.

ADDENDA.

1.

AN ACT to amend section ninety (90) of title four (4) of chapter thirty-four (34) of the General Statutes of Minnesota, being section two hundred and thirty-one (231) of chapter thirty-four (34) of "General Statutes one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878),"as amended by chapter eighteen (18) of the General Laws of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (1881), extra session, relating to religious corporations.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota.

Section 1. That section ninety (90) of title four (4) of chapter thirty-four (34) of the General Statutes, relating to religious corporations, being section two hundred and thirty-one (231) of chapter thirty-four (34) of "General Statutes one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878)," as amended by chapter eighteen (18) of the General Laws of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (1881), extra session, approved November third (3d), one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (1881), be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting the words "which place must be within the diocese to which such bishop belongs," after the words "to be located." and before the words "and the said bishop," where they occur in the seventeenth (17th) line of section one (1) of said chapter eighteen (18) of the printed volume of said extra session laws of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (1881); also by inserting the words "in the diocese of such denomination in which any such corporation is located," after the words "of such denomination," and before the words "together with," where they occur in the fortieth (40th) line of said section one (1) in said chapter eighteen (18) of said printed extra session laws of one thousand eight hundred and eighty one (1881); also by adding at end of said section as follows:

"Should any diocese or dioceses, now or hereafter created, of any religious denomination within which any such corporation belonging to such denomination is, or may hereafter be located, be at any time subdivided according to the rules and practice of such denomination, and one or more new dioceses be formed therefrom, or from parts thereof, the bishop and vicar general of any such new diocese and their successors in office, shall, as soon as appointed and instituted, by virtue of their respective offices forthwith be and become members of any such corporation or corporations located in such new diocese, with all the rights, duties, privileges, powers and obligations of such members as herein, or in the articles of incorporation provided, and the bishop and vicar-general of the diocese in which such corporation or corporations were located prior to such subdivision shall thenceforth cease to be members of any such corporation so located within such new diocese; and all the provisions of this section shall apply to any such new diocese, and to any such corporation or corporations therein located, with the same force and effect as to corporations now or hereafter located in any diocese now existing.

Religious corporations for taking, holding, receiving, and disposing of any real or personal property for the use or benefit of any diocese now or hereafter existing of any religious denomination within this State, and for administering the temporalities of such diocese, and for the further purposes and with the powers hereinafter specified, may be created and organized in the manner and with powers, privileges and franchises as follows:

The bishop of any such diocese wherein any such corporation is to be located shall associate with him the vicar general and chancellor of such diocese, and they, or a majority of them shall select or designate and associate with them two (2) other persons who shall be members of such religious denomination and residents of such diocese, and the said five (5) persons, upon adopting and signing in duplicate, under their hands and seals, articles of incorporation by them duly acknowledged, reciting the fact of the association and selection of such two (2) persons by said bishop, vicar general and chancellor as aforesaid, and containing the name, general purpose and place of location of such corporation, and having one of said articles recorded in the office of the register of deeds for the county within which place of location of any such corporation is situated, and the other filed in the office of the Secretary of State of this state, and their successors, shall thereupon be and become a body corporate, with power to take, hold, receive or dispose of any real or personal property for the use and benefit of such diocese, and for the use and benefit of the religious denomination therein creating such diocese, and to administer the temporalities of such diocese, and to establish and conduct schools, seminaries, colleges or any benevolent, charitable, religious or missionary work, or society of such religious denomination within such diocese, together with the powers and privileges in this act enumerated, and all the rights, powers and privileges of other religious corporations constituted under this chapter; and shall be capable of suing and being sued, holding, purchasing and receiving title by devise, gift, grant or other conveyance of and two any property real or personal, with power to mortgage, sell and convey the same or any part thereof, and may adopt and establish by-laws and make all rules and regulations necessary or expedient for the management of its affairs in accordance with law. The persons who may hold the offices respectively of bishop, vicar-general, and chancellor of such religious denomination within and for such diocese, and their successors in office forever, shall by virtue of their respective offices, each of them, always be members of such corporation, and no person who subscribes to such articles as bishop, vicar-general or chancellor, and no successor in office of any such person, shall continue to be a member of any such corporation after he or they shall have ceased to hold such office respectively. The two (2) persons so selected by said bishop, vicar-general and chancellor, and the persons who may be chosen as their successors as hereinafter provided, shall constitute the other members of said corporation, and the two persons so selected and designated in such articles of incorporation, shall remain members thereof for the term of two (2) years from the date of such articles, and until their successors are chosen in their places respectively, and the term of office of such two (2) persons and their successors shall be two (2) years from the time of their appointment and until their respective successors are chosen in their place and shall have accepted such office.

The successors respectively of such two (2) persons so selected by said bishop, vicar general and chancellor, and so signing such articles of incorporation as corporators, shall always be chosen by said other three corporators, viz: by the bishop, vicar general and chancellor, or by any two (2) of them, and said three (3) last named corporators shall have power at any time, whenever a vacancy shall occur in said membership, as to said corporators so selected, and as often as any such vacancy shall for any cause occur, whether by expiration of the time of holding, by resignation, death, or otherwise, to fill any such vacancy; every such appointment to be in writing and entered of record in the minutes of the corporation, such appointees to be members of such religious denomination and residents of the diocese in which the corporation is located. Any corporator so selected may at any time resign his office of corporator and cease to be a member of such corporation, such resignation and acceptance thereof to be always entered on the minutes of said corporation.

Should there be at any time a vacancy in the office of bishop of said diocese, or should there be for any reason at any time a person other than the bishop appointed in his stead, to administer the spiritual and temporal of said diocese therefor, or during the time of such vacancy or such suspension of the authority of the bishop, the administrator of said diocese or such other person as may be appointed according to the rules of said denomination to preside over and administer the spiritual and temporal affairs of said diocese shall, while he is such administrator or appointee, be a member of said corporation, with all the powers as such corporator that are by this act vested in such bishop, and in his place and stead; but his membership shall at once cease whenever such vacancy in the office of bishop shall be filled, or such bishop shall be no longer incapacitated to act by reason of such suspension of his authority.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved Feb. 27, 1883.

2.

AN ACT creating a board of fuel commissioners.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. The governor, state auditor and state treasurer are hereby constituted a board of fuel commissioners, whose duty it shall be to purchase such an amount of coal as may be necessary for the use of the various State institutions.

Sec. 2. The said board of fuel commissioners shall annually, on or before the first day of July in each and every year, give notice in such newspapers as they may deem necessary, for thirty days, that sealed proposals will be received at the office of the state auditor, until a day specified in said notice, for the delivery of coal for the use of the various State institutions, at such times, and at such places, and in such amounts as the said board may designate.

Sec. 3. It shall be the duty of the trustees of each of the State institutions using coal as fuel, to report to the said board of fuel commissioners on or before the nineteenth day of June in each year, an estimated amount of coal necessary for such institutions for the fiscal year next ensuing.

Sec. 4. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 3, 1883.

3.

AN ACT to amend section one (1) of chapter sixty-one (61) of the General Laws of the extra session of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (1881), relating to high school education.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. That section one (1) of chapter sixty-one (61) of the General Laws of the extra session of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (1881), be amended to read as follows: "The high school board shall have full discretionary power to consider and act upon applications of schools for State aid, and to prescribe the conditions upon which said aid shall be granted, and it shall be its duty to accept and aid such schools only as will, in its opinion, if aided, efficiently perform the service contemplated by law, but not more than five (5) schools shall be aided in each county in any one (1) year. any school once accepted and continuing to comply with the law and the regulations of the board made in pursuance thereof, shall be aided not less than three (3) years.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 2, 1883.

NOTE—The letters and words included in brackets [ ] in this publication of General Laws, are not in the bills approved by the governor and filed with the secretary of state; they are found in the engrossed bills, but were omitted or incorrectly copied in enrollment.

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
ST. PAUL, March 17, 1883.

I hereby certify that the foregoing laws have been carefully compared with the originals on file in this office, and that the same are true and correct copies thereof.

FRED VON BAUMBACH,
[Great Seal.] Secretary of State.

PUBLIC LAND FRAUDS.

The Land Commissioner's Report to Secretary Teller on Public Land Frauds in the West.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, March 15.—The commissioner of the general land office before the close of congress made a very elaborate report to the secretary of the interior upon the numerous frauds committed in the entry of public lands. In this report he called attention to the fact that investigation made during the past year had developed the existence of much fraud under the shield of the pre-emption, homestead and timber culture laws. He suggested that there ought to be in each land district at least one competent and reliable special agent, and in this office a sufficient organization to supervise and direct the [illegible] of such agents, and he recomm[illegible] that an appropriation of $150,000 be [illegible] for this purpose. Congress, however appropriated only $100,000 therefor, of which amount $50,000 is immediately available. The commissioner says he will very soon take the proper steps to carry out the object of this appropriation. The commissioner in his report says: "Efforts have been made to check the unlawful acts, but the proceedings have necessarily been confined to one or two localities, owing to the limited facilities of this office for such service."

QUOTED AT LENGTH.

After calling attention to reports of special agents exhibiting some of the methods of illegal entry which now prevail, he says:

The rapid absorption of public lands and other various acts has brought the remaining lands into great request, and the marketable price of unimproved lands in many parts of the country much exceeds the government price. This fact stimulates entries for speculative purposes, and the actual settler is prevented from making settlement unless he enters into an expensive contest to clear the land from a fraudulent claim or purchase at a speculative price the relinquishment of some claim of that character. My information is that desirable agricultural lands are in many instances covered with claims simultaneously with the filing in the local land office of the plats of township surveys. These claims consist of pre-emption filings, soldiers' homestead filings, timber culture and homestead entries. Such filings and entries are frequently made by professed agents, who in many cases immediately thereafter advertise relinquishment of the same for sale. The offering of relinquishments in this wholesale manner is prima facie evidence of the fraudulent character of the claims, and yet such claims hold the land until the parties controlling them can find customers. Settlers seeking lands cannot usually afford to expend the means or time necessary to the prosecution of a contest, and they are therefore compelled to abandon an attempt to make settlement or to buy their way to their public lands from persons who unlawfully control such lands.

IN THE TERRITORY OF DAKOTA,

which cast 5,000 votes at the last election, the number of agricultural entries to the present date exceeds 150,000, and such entries are now being made at the rate of more than 50,000 yearly. These frauds are not confined to Dakota, but extend to other States and Territories as well. Under the desert land act, entries are frequently made upon good grazing or agricultural lands which are leased for grazing or other purposes, or held for speculation. Forged soldiers' additional homestead certificates have been located on a large belt of the most valuable timber land in California, and the timber cut and removed. In the grazing districts title to agricultural lands and water sites is, in large classes of cases, obtained by perjury and fraud, followed or preceded by the unlawful enclosure of tracts of public lands, varying from some hundreds to several thousand acres each. It appears, also, in some cases, that lands so fenced in are parceled out according to the number of cattle possessed by individual ranchmen and the right to herd upon such public lands leased to them for a money consideration. In California, Oregon and Washington Territory collusive entries are made under the timber land act for the purpose of procuring or controlling the timber in large quantities. Valuable timber lands and lands unfit for anything but timber, are fraudulently entered under the homestead and pre-emption law. Timber lands have been so largely entered by false affidavits of settlement under these laws, that I felt compelled during the past year to place 3,000,000 acres on the market at the minimum price on agricultural land to avoid such wholesale criminality. In Alabama the government has been defrauded of some millions of dollars through the unlawful entry of coal and iron lands. A flood tide of illegal appropriations seems to be sweeping over the new States and Territories, threatening to engulf the entire public domain. The time has arrived when, in my serious judgment, either a complete radical change in the public laws and their administration, or some adequate means for enforcing the penalties of the existing law has become an alternative that can no longer be disregarded. There are now before this office claims in some initiative or progressive stage covering titles to more than 200,000,000 acres of land, of which some 50,000,000 acres are embraced in individual entries under the general laws. That a very considerable proportion of these claims are without validity or merit is indisputably true, yet this office has been compelled for years past to treat doubtful claims as valid and to pass over to claimants the title of the United States, because it could not investigate the facts. The same course must largely be continued unless a change in measures shall be effected.

The National Woman's Christian Temperance union, with its thirty-one auxiliary State and two Territorial unions, is the largest society ever composed exclusively of women, and conducted entirely by them. The number of local unions is about 3,000, with a membership of about 50,000, and a large number of juvenile organizations. This society is the lineal descendent of the great temperance crusade of 1873-4, and is a union of Christian women of all churches, for the purpose of educating the young; forming a better public sentiment; reforming the drinking classes; and prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors.

The next English Church congress will be held at Reading, near Oxford, in October. A temporary building, to hold 2,500 persons, will be erected for the purpose.

FACTS ABOUT FORESTRY.

Leonard B. Hodges Enlightens the Benighted Minds of the Minnesota State Horticultural Society.

Some Good Practical Suggestions as to the Best Methods of Cultivating Trees on Our Prairies.

The Kind of Trees Adapted to Forestry and the Way to Prepare the Soil for Their Accommodation Pointed Out.

Accepting an invitation of the Minnesota State Horticultural society to address them on the subject of Forestry, I offer this paper. No economic question of the present has a greater bearing on the future well-being of the State than forestry. I use the term "State" in its broadest sense. The old-fashioned word, commonwealth, is more significant, inasmuch as on its broad face it suggests the idea that there is a species of wealth that can be enjoyed by all the citizens of the State. The wealth of forestry, with attendant comforts, is of that kind, and its blessings reach out beyond the immediate control of the legal proprietor of the forest, and embrace within its ameliorating influences his more immediate neighbors, whether friends or foes; and so, as the good work goes on, from one neighborhood to another, the actual wealth first developed by a few, to a very large extent becomes the common wealth of the many.

The pioneer farmer out on our oceanic prairies, who surrounds his quarter section with a broad belt of forest trees, protects not only his own fields and crops from the damaging effects of storms, but also to a great extent protects his adjoining neighbors, who in common with him enjoy the wealth he has developed, and he can no more prevent them from the enjoyment thereof, than from the benefits of sunlight or rainfall, which are the common wealth of all of God's creatures. Hence I take the ground that it is not only eminently proper, but that it is the duty of the State, in every suitable way, to aid by appropriate legislation in the development or creation of this kind of common wealth. Further on in this paper, if I find I have room, I shall advert more fully to the pressing necessity of State and national legislation for the protection and encouragement of forestry, and if I succeed in stirring up to a realizing sense of their duty in this behalf, I shall feel that I have not lived in vain. Forestry, in its true sense and meaning, as I understand it, consists in the planting, cultivation and management of larger areas of ground than has been attempted; in the rearing of long lines of wind-breaks or belts of forest timber, so arranged as to arrest the force of prevailing winds; in the care, protection and preservation of our native forests, and in encouraging and assisting nature in the rehabilitation of extensive tracts of original forests that have been destroyed by fire, and where, phœnix-like, a new crop of young forest trees are springing up from the ashes. In its broadest sense its scope is larger, but so far as we are practically concerned, this is about the size of it. The development of new forests and the preservation of the native forests in Minnesota are the particular subdivisions of forestry which more nearly concern us. Geographically located as the State of Minnesota is (on the eastern border, and including within her boundaries a portion of that immense interior treeless region which stretches from the southern limit of the Staked plains in Texas to the Saskatchewan, and nearly to Hudson's bay on the north—from Eastern Kansas and Nebraska, Western Iowa and the Big woods of Minnesota on the east, to the foot hills of the Rocky mountains on the west—practically taking in 20 deg. of latitude and 10 deg. of longitude—in round numbers covering 1,000,000 square miles, or 640,000,000 acres—enough for 4,000,000 farms of 160 acres each, and room for 20,000,000 of people), the subject under discussion is necessarily one of great local interest to Minnesota, as well as the nation at large. This vast "interior" region is PRACTICALLY TREELESS.

The exceptions are portions of the coteaus in the vicinity of the Sisseton reservation, the Black Hills, Turtle mountains, Pembina mountains, and narrow strips and small groves along some of the water courses and lakes—in comparison with the whole, hardly enough to swear by. With such a neighbor adjoining and flanking us in the rear, I have often thought while traversing the great prairies of Dakota that, for all practical purposes, she was a part of, or, at the furthest, simply a suburb of Minnesota; and it is extremely difficult for a Minnesotian to talk forestry without taking cognizance of Dakota as a prominent factor in the solution of our own forestry questions. Not only Dakota, but her adjacent neighbor, Manitoba—the Prairie Province—with the vast outlying prairie region stretching west and northwest to the foot of the Rockies—all that open region through which the fierce blasts of the polar regions find unobstructed passage, culminating in Minnesota "blizzards;" and, in the other direction, the vast prairie, arid region of the Southwest, whence come the simoon-like winds, so withering and antagonistic to growing crops, forest culture and human comfort. All these are factors not to be ignored. They force themselves upon you, as horticulturists, as your most bitter, determined, uncompromising foes; blasting your hopes, destroying at one sweep the results of years of patient toil, confounding your calculations, and every now and then setting you up on your beam ends in the most unexpected manner. The prairie farmers suffer from the same causes to an equal, if not greater extent, than yourselves, and their misfortunes entail corresponding disasters upon our commercial and manufacturing interests. Now that we have finally settled up our old railroad-bonded indebtedness, and on a basis satisfactory to our creditors, the enemies of Minnesota have nothing left them to harp on but our climate, and even that we can so modify by tree planting, as not only to "temper the wind to the shorn lamb," but of their last remaining weapon. These elemental forces are undoubtedly all right and play an important part in the economy of nature. We have only to guard against them when on the rampage, and in doing this forestry is the prime factor, the central figure in the whole business. I have neither time nor patience to even attempt to answer the puerile arguments and unfounded assertions that trees won't grow on our Western prairies. Life is too short to fool any portion of it away in that direction. Facts, not theories, claim our attention. The fact that within the last ten years hundreds of groves, containing millions of healthy, vigorous young forest trees, are now growing far out in the treeless region, where science had prejudged and doomed the work an impossibility, must be acknowledged. The fact that young groves of forest trees are now being successfully grown on the line of the Northern Pacific railroad, away out on and beyond the 100th meridian, has also got to be admitted, science and its votaries to the contrary notwithstanding.

Where weeds and grass will grow, there also forest trees can grow, and where they grow the more agriculture will succeed, and the better you know how to do your work, the larger the measure of your success. I am assured that I am expected to give a good deal of this sort of knowing how to do it, in as few words as possible. Having written and spoken so much on this matter, and time and again reiterated the same instructions, it seems to me unnecessary to again repeat what has been so often said by myself, but has also frequently been better said by others. Like the thrice-told tale, I am sometimes weary with the hearing of it, and when I am asked by apparently intelligent men if trees will really grow out on those great prairies, I feel very much as the preacher did who, after having devoted the best part of his life to the faithful preaching of the gospel, was astonished one day by one of his congregation asking him if it really was a fact that Christ was dead.

PREPARATION OF THE SOIL.

This is the first thing to do, and is of paramount importance. Unless properly done failure is the rule—success the exception. Get your ground in condition to produce a rattling good corn crop, and you have taken a long step in the right direction. In order to do this, in commencing de novo, break the prairie sod in June. Break it about three inches deep. Be vigilant and careful in this very important preliminary work. See that your breaking plow is a good one. Adjust it so it can't help but do good work. Keep the lay sharp. Draw it out every few "bouts" by hammering. Use the hammer on the lay freely and only use the file for putting on the last touches. Should the ground be at all rocky, put a man with pick and spade to remove the rock ahead of the breaking plow. Should you make a "balk" back up and take it out. In finishing up the "land" don't leave a strip of unbroken prairie from six inches to two feet wide as many do, but clean out your "dead furrow" so thoroughly that no green grass is visible in it. Having done this much nature then steps in and the process of the decomposition of the tough prairie sod commences. Usually by the middle of the ensuing August the sod has so far decomposed that you can commence "back-setting." This can be done with your breaking plow, unless the gauge wheel prevents the plow from running deep enough. If so, change it for the strongest stirring plow you can get. Commence "backsetting" at the dead furrow—throwing your furrows in and toward it, and bring up three or four inches of fresh dirt. Simply turning over the sod is of no account, and is worse than useless. It is full as heavy work to "backset" properly as to break, and it costs as much to do it. You have now laid a substantial foundation for success, and it will be good practice to let the ground rest till the following spring, that the action of the elements may step in and aid you in the process of disintegration. Then commence harrowing, and harrow "till you can't rest." By this time, unless it is a peculiarly perverse piece of ground, you have got it pretty thoroughly "bulldozed," and if you are in no urgent hurry to get your trees planted, plant the ground to corn or potatoes, the thorough cultivation of which leaves the ground in excellent condition. If you can't plant to some hoed crop, you can and in doing this you cannot be too careful in procuring clean seed, for an almost imperceptible amount of "foul stuff" is sure to entail a vast amount of labor in its extermination. After the crop is off, again plow the ground as deep as you can afford to, bringing up more new dirt. There is no possible danger of plowing too deep for forest trees. In this the danger is all the other way—in shallow plowing. If you are not so situated as to cultivate to crop, then summer-fallow the ground to be planted the coming fall or spring.

SOW IT TO SMALL GRAIN,

When to plant is now the question. Either fall or spring, which? Could I predict with any certainty what the weather would be for six months ahead, I could answer this question positively. Without this positive knowledge, the best I can do is to present the "pros" and "cons," leaving you to assume the responsibility to go ahead on your own judgment. If fall planting is preferred, don't begin until the frost has killed the foliage. In our latitude about the first week in October is early enough to commence, and you can keep on planting till the ground freezes up. If spring planting is preferred, begin as soon as the frost is out deep enough and the ground in good working condition. One year with another, the entire month of May can be devoted to planting forest trees in Minnesota or Dakota. The advantages of fall planting are chiefly in the fact that the ground becomes firmly packed among the roots of the young tree to the exclusion of the air, and that it is in better position to appropriate the moisture resulting from the winter snows and early spring rains, getting thereby such a "send-off" as to enable the young tree to successfully go through a dry spell that would be very damaging, if not fatal, to spring planting. Such dry spells do occasionally prevail all over the Northwest about planting time, and hang on unmercifully. On the other hand, an open winter, with frequent or occasional thawing or freezing, occasionally proves fatal to fall planting, the action of frost heaving the fall planted seedling or cutting nearly or quite out of the ground. Where well rooted young trees are used, we overcome this trouble to a great extent by deep planting. While spring planting escapes this danger, it is in bad shape to withstand a protracted growth, and right there is where fall planting has the inside track. But should your spring planting be followed up by occasional timely showers, the newly-planted trees grow right along with great vigor. The tree planter must take his chances. I have for many years planted largely both spring and fall, and my experience does not yet justify me in bringing in a verdict either way. In fact, I consider it one of the least important of the many conundrums of forestry.

THE HANDLING OF YOUNG TREES

before planting is an important matter, and deserves a passing paragraph. You will not be greatly astonished to learn for a fact that a very large percentage of all the forest trees planted on the Northwestern prairies are practically dead before they are planted. This is especially true of all the evergreens or conifers, and the trouble is aggravated in this, that the inexperienced planter can't always tell a dead tree from a live one, and keeps right on planting stuff only fit for a brush heap. It would seem as if any one could tell a dead cottonwood seedling from a live one; and as more cottonwoods are being planted than any other variety, I think it best to say that millions of them are gathered every fall before the terminal bud has formed—are packed with all their green foliage in full vigor in tight boxes for shipment, and commence heating at once, and on arrival at their destination are "too dead to skin"—they are planted, and the victims are naturally discouraged, and lose their interest in tree planting, because they don't grow. Millions of young trees and cuttings, shipped by careful, conscientious men, who know their business, are unaccountably delayed in transit, arriving at destination in a damaged condition. Railroad managers and freight agents ought to make a memorandum of this, as the losses occasioned thereby are particularly aggravating, and arouse the most bitter feeling against the railroads. The damage to, and total loss of, the trees themselves, are wholly insignificant in comparison to the losses involved in their delay; for a man can plant damaged trees on his tree claim if he can get them in time, but if they are delayed too long on the railroads, his claim, worth anywhere from $50 to $1,500, is in jeopardy for the want of $30 or $40 worth of trees which he has bought and paid for, railroad freight included, and he must resort to the most degrading and contemptible artifices to hold his claim. As a railroad employe and as an independent citizen, and acting in both capacities, it is my duty to call the attention of the proper authorities to the necessity of reform in this behalf.

PLANT DEEP,

and press the loose earth so firmly about the roots as to prevent any cavities, and any circulation of air among the roots. This process also assists in retaining the moisture, and thus lessens the danger from drought. Unless the weather is unusually wet, it is good practice to make a puddle of mud and water of the consistency of gem cake batter, into which the roots of the young tree should be thrust. At all times during the planting season keep on your guard against the withering effects of sun and wind on the roots. Do not permit the least exposure in this direction that can possibly be avoided, and when it comes to evergreens, bear in mind that, owing to the resinous nature of the sap, what an inexperienced man would consider but a very slight exposure is usually fatal. From my own experience in fishing, I am satisfied that a brook trout will live out of water about as long as an evergreen will live with its roots exposed to wind and sun.

WHAT VARIETIES TO PLANT.

A good general rule is to plant those varieties that are indigenous to your locality, or as near you as you can find them. In going from the big woods of Minnesota to the foot hills of the Rocky mountains, one variety after another drops out, until our choice is limited to the cottonwood and box elder. These varieties keep up a very straggling procession clear across the great interior treeless region—in fact, clear across the continent. I am informed on good authority that the hackberry, red cedar, cottonwood and box elder are the only varieties of forest trees, that have held their own, and can occasionally be found in nearly every portion of the arid region, all other varieties having played out. So far as Western Minnesota and Northern Dakota are concerned, I very confidently recommend box elder, green ash, white willow, cottonwood and elm, as absolutely sure to grow if properly handled. I might also, with nearly the same certainty, recommend the soft maple, but for its unfortunate habit of killing down if its first winter out happens to be an open one; but for all that, I find there is a good deal of "come out" to them. With this list you can plant your ten-acre grove on your tree claim with more certainty of satisfactory results than from the planting of any other crop I know of; and as these varieties grow up and shade the ground, you can gradually introduce more valuable and less hardy varieties, thinning out enough of the original occupants to make room for their new neighbors, leaving enough of the "old settlers" as "nurse trees" to protect the new-comers. In some such manner as this, it is not unreasonable to suppose that nearly all the varieties of timber now found in the Big Woods of Minnesota will eventually be grown successfully all over the great treeless and arid region of the interior, and the Great American desert, which once figured so conspicuously on our maps, will ultimately become a tradition of the past.

CULTIVATION.

The wonderful results obtained from a comprehensive and thorough cultivation of the human intellect are not more striking and strongly marked than are the results of good cultivation upon the earth and her products. Hence I recommend the most thorough cultivation of the soil from which the young forest is to be evolved, until such time as the growth of the trees prevents further cultivation.

The proper time for cultivation is from the time grass starts until about the 1st of August. By doing this you enable the trees to withstand drouth. Six inches of finely pulverized earth is the best mulch you can get, and a good mulch retains moisture and retards evaporation. In this connection permit me to jump over the traces, in further illustration of the effects of cultivation of the soil of the open prairie region between the Big woods and the foot hills of the Rocky mountains. In its uncultivated state its normal condition seems one of aridity and sterility. The grass is generally short and scanty, except in the low grounds. The sod is hard, and beneath it is still harder and very compact; the whole surface of the country shedding the rainfall better than an average board shanty. In a dry time the surface, under the exposure of hot suns and scorching winds, becomes parched and cracked into innumerable fissures, sometimes and in some localities to an extent that it renders traveling on horseback a dangerous exercise. I have seen large tracts of our own Minnesota prairie in this condition, and of no more apparent value to the casual observer than so many acres of blue sky. Not a tree, bush or shrub within sight. Practically a desert. While the frost is coming out the soil becomes somewhat ameliorated, and occasional showers permit the process of breaking the sod. This is the first step in arresting the aridity. The sod soon rots. Then set the plow down as deep as you can navigate it, bringing up to the surface as much fresh dirt as possible. You have now got it where it feels the effect of rainfall. It don't shed rain like a duck's back any longer. Continue the preparation of the soil by repeated and deeper plowings. When you get somewhere in the neighborhood of ten or twelve inches of mellow ground, stick in the cottonwood and box elder seedlings, also seeds of the green ash and some willow cuttings. Apply the cultivator. Soon the process of commences. Summoning the silent forces of nature, the young seedlings and the seeds and cuttings commence the process of sub-soiling by thrusting forth innumerable roots. Silently, slowly, surely, yet with irresistible power, they penetrate the soil. They are hunting for food and drink. They are commencing the struggle for existence. At this critical period the intelligent tree planter steps in and assists nature by the cultivation of the surface soil. With this timely assistance the young plans redouble their exertions. The moisture is pumped to their extremities—their circulation is healthy; they grow both ways—their roots tearing away toward the bowels of the earth with a vigor and energy that puts to shame the best efforts of the most ponderous locomotive engine. From one season to another the subsoiling process goes on; the roots grow larger, longer, and stronger, getting down below the influence of scorching winds and blazing sun. The bodies and branches shoot up toward the sun, after heat, light and air. The overshadowing branches, the deepening soil, the falling leaves, complete the process, and that particular ten acres of God's footstool under the auspices of the congressional timber culture act, stands forth redeemed, regenerated—an "oasis" in the desert. The shadow of a "great rock in a weary land" is nowhere beside it. It compels an involuntary tribute of admiration from the most brutish soul. The beasts of the field and the fowls of the air seek shelter and find solid comfort within its hospitable area. The belated, confused, weary, storm-buffeted traveler hails it as a sure landmark from which to take accurate bearings, and in times of exceeding peril a certain refuge and sometimes salvation from death itself. In portions of Western Minnesota there was scarcely a drop of rainfall last season from before harvest until the beginning of winter, and not enough then to amount to anything. The unbroken, uncultivated prairie seemed dried out, and except in springy places,

WHOLLY DESTITUTE OF MOISTURE.

Even the sloughs, which in ordinary times are reservoirs of water, were in some localities so thoroughly dried out that the ground was cracked and split in all directions. Yet in the midst of this seeming aridity the cultivated fields showed no signs of distress—the summer-fallowed soil was moist to within an inch of the surface, and in the young groves of four to six year's growth the soil was absolutely moist—nearly wet from the surface down. Three hundred miles further out west and north on the line of the Northern Pacific railway the conditions were the same. They had more rainfall out there in October and November than in Western Minnesota, but all through August and September, the season of harvesting and threshing, there was scarcely rain enough to wet through a man's shirt sleeves—the uncultivated ground was parched and dry. In backsetting the breaking, which had been done in June for railroad tree planting, we brought up and turned over from five to eight inches of soil that seemed as dry as powder. Prairie fires were running in all directions; this all through the month of August—yet at no time during the season did our young trees grow more rapidly, or present a more healthy or vigorous appearance, than during this season of drouth. We had some days out there, then, when it taxed the physical endurance of men and teams to their utmost limits; and I can honestly record it as a fact that our young trees out in Hazen's desert, on and beyond the 100th meridian, that were planted the preceding May, grown out there from seeds, cuttings and yearling seedlings, within 100 days from date of planting, had thrust their roots down into the earth to the depth of two to four feet, pumping their own water, growing like weeds, and laughing to scorn influences that theoretically ought to have destroyed them. In fact, their growth was so rapid I dared not use the cultivator among them enough to keep the weeds down, and even with this precaution their terminal buds delayed their appearance later than usual, but they ripened up in good shape, and have gone into winter quarters in good condition. Although not strictly called for, or in order, I desire to make mention of another fact, because the majority of mankind don't remember much of anything more than a year, and this paper will be a part of the record in the progress of forestry. The big freeze of May 20, 1882, or thereabouts, extending all over the Northwest—giving them a dose of genuine winter all through Central Iowa—killing down their corn and giving it a back-set from which it never fully recovered—had similar disaster effects on forestry. Millions of young ash and box elder plants, from the seed, planted the preceding fall, were then just fairly out of the ground, and were utterly destroyed. Our earliest planting of box elder and cottonwood yearlings had commenced putting forth leaves. The buds of the white willow cuttings were swollen full, and the white willow hedges of one year's growth and upward were nearly in full foliage. This freeze had no apparent effect on any of the foregoing of one year's growth and over, except the cottonwood. In our railroad work, I estimate nearly or quite one-fourth of our yearling cottonwoods of the earliest planting were killed, root and branch, by this unexpected freeze. In certain localities in Minnesota, in the central portions of the State, I observed young artificial forests where rows of cottonwoods, ten to twelve feet high, were killed out root and branch, by this same freeze; the rows of ash, elm, box elder, willow and other varieties in the same grove escaping unharmed. I have always been a staunch friend of the cottonwood, and am yet, and don't propose to go back on it. It is a good friend of ours; but for all that this weak spot in its character should be recorded.

LEGISLATION.

Some of you may deem this a digression. Not so. We are here on business, the vigorous prosecution of which promotes the commonwealth. The machinery of state was constructed for the very end we have in view—the promotion, security, and protection of the commonwealth. Let us call into requisition some portion of this machinery in the protection of our native forests, now being ruthlessly destroyed by fire; in the care and protection of the hundreds of thousands of acres which have been burned over, and are now struggling to again cover and reclothe the charred and denuded surface; in such legislation as will prevent the wholesale waste and unnecessary destruction of young and growing timber in our lumbering operations; in such legislation as will abolish and prevent the abuses now perpetrated with impunity under the timber culture act; and also such legislation as will scatter broadcast such practical information on the subject of forestry among the people on our prairie districts as will enable them not only to accomplish the best results in that direction in the shortest possible time, and with the least expense of labor, time and money, but also such literature as will wake them up, arouse their enthusiasm and create a generous emulation and rivalry for the best results.

Mr. President, our broad, beautiful, fertile prairies, in our own State and for hundreds of miles beyond, are fast filling up with families from all parts of the globe, allured by the glowing publications of the State, the railroad companies, and the public press. The little board shanties, sod cabins and "dug-outs" already spot tens of thousands of quarter sections far out in

THE ILLIMITABLE WESTERN HORIZON.

They are the pioneers of civilization—the advance guard of that overwhelming wave of emigration that even now is the astonishment of the world. The great mass are poorly equipped for the struggle that awaits them. Fuel and shelter are their primal necessities, without which thousands will be driven back, cursing the agencies which allured them hither. These men are there not merely to eke out a miserable existence. They are depended on to raise food for the world; to furnish business for the railroads, and revenues for the state. Consequently the State and the railroads are mutually interested in keeping them contented. What better way than to teach and assist them in planting forests and wind-breaks for shelter and fuel, rendering them thereby fully as comfortable as they would be 300 miles further south. Is the State doing her duty in this behalf? Do her representatives take any interest in the matter at all commensurate with its importance? Do you, gentlemen, and does this State university take such interest in this cause as you might do without damaging your prospects for time or eternity?

These questions are pertinent; possibly impertinent. Here we are reveling among pine slabs and sawdust, up to our necks, while 100,000 of our frontier friends are, even at this moment, twisting slough hay and praying Almighty God to keep them from perishing.

WHAT ARE THE RAILROADS DOING?

Some of them are doing nobly; some are doing just nothing at all. But in the aggregate they are doing far more than the State for the encouragement of tree planting. The men who represent these districts in the legislature are expected by their constituents to lead off in this direction. They have only to do it to secure such cordial support from the older and better settled portions of the State as to make it a success—a success that will crown them with glory far more imperishable than can be gained in senatorial contests. I am informed that in the publication of your transactions you are unwisely limited to a 300 page pamphlet. If this is so, I have already taken up too much space. I have tried to be economical in the use of words—merely touching briefly on the most salient points, a mere skeleton, instead of a well rounded body of facts elaborately illustrated. You need a bigger legislative appropriation, so that a man can take room enough to do justice to his subject without trespassing on the territory the next man needs and is equally entitled to, and big enough to publish and circulate an edition large enough to go around. Such being the case, the other section of my paper, Ornamental Tree Planting, must be postponed.

Mrs. Langtry's Cranium.

A few days ago Prof. Edgar C. Beall of Atlanta, Ga., a well known phrenologist, made a phrenological examination of Mrs. Langtry with the following result: From a phrenological point of view, Mrs. Langtry certainly deserves her sobriquet of the "Jersey Lily," for there are not many women more womanly or better endowed with the qualities we most admire in the gentler sex. She does not seem to possess the very bluest of blue blood—that is in the sense of a haughty patrician instinct, although she is decidedly refined and æsthetical in all her tastes. In all her social relations she would be likely to evince much pride and exclusiveness, and yet she would judge people more by their personal worth or attractiveness than by the mere point they had reached in the estimation of the world at large. In other words, she would appreciate affinities of "heart and brain," whether high or humble, in a palace or a hovel.

Her brain is large for a woman, yet the diameter and height of the frontal lobes are not sufficient to give a very commanding breadth and power of mind. Intellectually she should be noted for quick perception, fine discrimination, analytical talent, memory, brilliency and subtlety, rather than profundity and strength. And, while she may never startle the world with remarkable inventions or by leading any great crusade, she will manifest much intelligence wherever required, and enough executive power to shine in her specialty. The brain centers in the occipital region are for the most part very largely developed, particularly love of the opposite sex and affection for women. There could not well be a more ardent lover or a more devoted mother. Combativeness and the destructive instinct, also the faculty of concentrativeness or continuity, are quite deficient; hence her energy, application and patience will be weak in an uncongenial pursuit. Firmness is well developed, however, and whenever her enthusiasm is aroused, she will be very persistent. She will finish, but not without intermission. She can enjoy reading short paragraphs, but would easily be annoyed by a prosy book or speech. As an actress she will not, at present, succeed in sustaining a powerful emotion through several successive scenes, but will excel in rapidly changing situations. In this respect she is more like the French or Americans than the English.

Ideality, or love of beauty, is strong, but its phase is practical rather than imaginative. Imitation takes the phase of adaptiveness rather than mimicry, and considerable dramatic experience will probably be necessary before she can conceal her individuality. Her forehead is somewhat narrow in the temples, and her love of music is weak. Language, indicated by the projection of the eye beyond the cheek bone, is full, but if larger would add much to her power of expression. Altogether, she will be noted in private life for sweetness of disposition, warmth of affection, excellent taste and practical sense. As an actress she will be distinguished for naturalness, grace and a charming individuality, rather than tragic intensity of power. Nature has done well by her, and the world will no doubt be better for her having lived in it.

Weighting Down the Waist.

Nineteenth Century: Women, especially those of the upper classes, who are not obliged to keep themselves in condition by work, lose after middle age (sometimes earlier) a considerable amount of their height, not by stooping, as men do, but by actual collapse, sinking down, mainly to be attributed to the perishing of the muscles that support the frame, in consequence of habitual and constant pressure of stays, and dependence upon the artificial support by them afforded. Every girl who wears stays that press upon these muscles, and restrict the free development of the fibers that form them, relieving them from their natural duties of supporting the spine, indeed incapacitating them from so doing, may feel sure that she is preparing herself to be a dumpy woman. A great pity! Failure of health among women when the vigor of youth passes away is but too patent, and but too commonly caused by this practice. Let the man who admires the piece of pipe that does duty for a human body picture to himself the wasted form and seamed skin. Most women, from long custom of wearing these stays, are really unaware how much they are hampered and restricted. A girl of twenty, intended by nature to be one of her finest specimens, gravely assures one that her stays are not tight, being exactly the same size as those she was first put into, nor perceiving her condemnation in the fact that she has since grown five inches in height and two in shoulder-breadth. Her stays are not too tight, because the constant pressure has prevented the natural development of heart and lung space. The dainty waist of the poets is precisely that flexible slimness that is destroyed by stays. The form resulting from them is not slim, but a piece of pipe, and as inflexible. But while endeavoring to make clear the outrage upon practical good sense and sense of beauty, it is necessary to understand and admit the whole state of the case. A reason, if not a necessity, for some sort of a corset may be found when the form is very redundant; this, however, cannot be with the very young and slight; but all that necessity could demand, and that practical good sense and fitness would concede, could be found in a strong, elastic kind of jersey, sufficiently strong, and even stiff, under the bust to support it, and sufficiently elastic at the sides and back to injure no organs and impede no functions. Even in the case of the young and slight an elastic band under the false ribs would not be injurious, but perhaps the contrary, serving as a constant hint to keep the chest well forward and the shoulders back; but every stiff, unyielding machine, crushing the ribs and destroying the fiber of muscle, will be fatal to health, to freedom of movement, and to beauty; it is scarcely too much to say that the wearing of such amounts to stupidity in those who do not know the consequences (for over and over again warning has been given) and to wickedness in those who do.

Denominational lines are not drawn as closely as they once were. In the thirteen years since the reunion, the Presbyterian church of the United States has received from other churches no less than 716 ministers, or an average of fifty-five each year. They came chiefly from Scotland, Ireland, England and Canada, with a very few from the continent. Many came from other Presbyterian bodies, a considerable number from the Congregationalists, and a few from the Methodists, Lutherans and Episcopalians.

THE STATE FARM BUILDING.

The New and Picturesque Structure to be Built Upon the State Agricultural College Farm.

A Step to Add Importance and Dignity to the Department and Forward the Work.

The one important step necessary to placing the new university farm into working order has at last been taken in deciding upon the plans for the proposed farm buildings. The plans are furnished by L. S. Buffington, those submitted in the winter, though excellent as regards the comfort and convenience of the proposed buildings, were yet considered by the regents to be too elaborate. It has been decided not to put so much money into buildings, but more into machinery and stock and other details, by which more practical benefit will be reaped from the expenditure. Prof. Porter says of the work:

Some delay has been unavoidable in even getting matters along as far as they are now. The farm being a State institution, everything had to be done in due legal form. But now that the expenditures for the buildings have been duly sanctioned by the legislature, the work of building may be regarded as fairly under headway.

A FINANCIAL TRANSACTION.

The reason of the State's being able to go forward in this scheme of improvement on its university farm lies in the fact of a most successful financial transaction on the part of the regents. The old farm was platted about six months ago and nearly $60,000 have already been realized upon it; and $40,000 more will without a doubt be realized ere the lots are all disposed of. This gives plenty of money for present needs and leaves no cause of uneasiness for the future. The present farm was purchased at so low a rate that the most of this large sum of money can be put into the equipment and improvement of the new one. In addition to this is the regular endowment and the yearly stipend to come from the government in case a successful experimental station is operated. And so there is no lack of funds. The only solicitude is that felt in the responsibility of handling these funds to the best possible advantage. The present buildings are the beginning of a more extensive collection to arise in the course of time. The desire of the management seems likely to be followed in this, as this is one of the most favorable regions in the whole country for the establishment of a complete experimental station.

THE PROPOSED BUILDING.

The farm on which the proposed new building will be erected consists of ninety-five acres of land in Ramsey county adjoining the Ramsey county poor farm, lying along Como avenue and distant from the University about three miles. The external architecture of the building is in the Queen Anne style now preponderating, and is a very attractive structure, and will present an imposing appearance from the eminence it will occupy.

The second floor is made up of an admirable arrangement of chambers, lofts, and others which will make the structure ample for every need. Accommodations will be provided for between thirty and forty students.

THE SITE FOR THE NEW BUILDING

is a most attractive one. It is nearly at the foot of a gently descending slope. This secures for it excellent drainage, protection from the winds, and a commanding and agreeable prospect. The slope in the rear is thickly wooded. In front is a wide view of fertile and cultivated country. The immediate vicinity is highly susceptible to an improvement in which neither picturesque nor practical features are omitted. The new building itself, as seen from the design, is a combination of what is most pleasing to the sight, and, at the same time, what is most convenient. It is unmistakably a farm building, and the slight irregularity which adds to its appearance is also necessary to its peculiar needs. A tower in the front is to contain a large bell for summoning the men to their meals. The rooms for the professor's family can be kept entirely separate from the remainder of the building. The whole is to be heated by furnace. The greater part of the farm work will probably be done by students who will have their rooms in the building, and consequently their wants have been taken into consideration in the construction. The students will have their rooms in the second story, with bath rooms and closets entirely separate from the others. Provision has also been made for a reading room. The building is amply sufficient in its proportions for all these needs. The main building is 118 x42, and the structure which extends to the rear contains wood-shed, carriage house, etc., and is 100x30. The stone and lumber is already on the ground, and work will commence immediately.

Coming Spring Bonnets.

New York Mail and Express: The shape of the new spring bonnets is medium. No bonnets so tiny as the small capotes which have been popular this winter are shown, and no huge pokes like those of last season are thus far imported. The new bonnets are ornate with flowers and a plentiful mixture of gold tinsel. Colored straws in every shade and tint are shown in profusion. A season of flowers is predicted, and the dandelion is the flower of the season. Little clusters of the blossoms are mounted on the top rim of the bonnet, mixed with pompons and ribbon, or two shades of the flower in ribbon—the pale lemon-like tint of the edge of the petals and the darker orange shade of the center of the blossom are used. An exquisite little cottage bonnet of Havana brown straw is trimmed on the brim with a mass of gold-colored pompons, ostrich tips, dandelions, flowers, buds and leaves, and a rosette-like bow of gold velvet at one side. Strings of gold velvet two inches wide finish the bonnet. An exquisite poke bonnet of pale strawberry pink straw has a band of velvet an inch and a half wide placed near the edge of the brim. A large bow of satin ribbon in strawberry color and in two widths, one an inch wide, the other two inches, is placed on top of the rim, and a cluster of long-stemmed dandelions is nestled at one side. The strings of the bonnet are double in the two widths of the ribbon. Black lace pokes, with tiny capotes in ecru lace and gold tinsel lace are also offered among the first exhibitions of spring millinery.

Fashions in Gloves.

Fashions in gloves have changed suddenly. The very swell thing is for ladies to go gloveless when in full dress. The fashion is not at all popular yet, but bids fair to come into favor, as it has been set by several of the most advanced leaders. It is a violent change from the very long gloves that till recently were in fashion. The long gloves were a blessing to women with unattractive arms, but the women with good arms were not so enthusiastic over them. The victory is in favor of beautiful arms, which goes to show there are more of that sort than the other. Now that I think of it, however, I don't remember that I ever met a woman who didn't believe that her arms were beautiful. With men the fashion has also changed radically. It has not been the proper thing for men to wear gloves with evening dress for some years past. This season, however, both in London and in Paris, light gloves are worn. They should not be pure white. The great glove makers claim that they will be ruined if women decide to go without gloves.

Moss-Grown Plants.

New York Commercial Advertiser says that Mr. Powers of Framingham, Mass., may score one toward the success of Dumesnil moss, now that the horticultural society of New York have invited the discussion of the feasibility of growing plants without earth. Those who have given a fair trial to plants placed in Dumesnil moss cannot but be pleased with results. Especially for window gardening are they desirable. The pots are light, there is no dirt, and a more constant bloom is kept. Besides, moss-grown plants do not seem to suffer from neglect if not watered, or rather they will not dry up and refuse to rally if left without a drink for a day or two. We are glad that this way of growing plants is to be investigated and discussed by our plantsmen. Experiments under the auspices of the Massachusetts Horticultural society have been so satisfactory as to endorse this departure from old methods.

A Costly Infant.

Edward King's Paris Letter: Sarah is—yes, the news is now confirmed—in an interesting situation. And, furthermore, M. Damala is not going for a soldier, but means to stay at home and dandle upon his knee the boy or girl, as it may happen to be. Madame Bernhardt-Damala has engagements every night for the next ten months. She has heavy forfeit money to pay if she violates one of her contracts; consequently, the birth of her infant Damala will presumably cost the family something like 100,000 francs. What an expensive menage! M. Damala can, nevertheless, congratulate himself on having married a woman who has an excellent head for business. She will pay her debts, and be rich again. Her incessant activity and wonderful endurance give ample guarantee of this.

WOMAN'S LOVE.

"Oh, this is woman's love, its joy, its pain."
To gaze on him, the loved one, and to trace
His image (which no time can e'er efface)
On thy heart's tablets; then, when he is gone,
Memory of him may cheer thee when alone;
To see him smile, to watch his speaking eye
Gazing on thine, as if it asked reply;
To know his voice amid a hundred 'round,
And feel thy beating heart respond the sound.

To lean confiding on his arm and know,
If danger threatens, 'twill avert the blow;
To listen for his footsteps, and to hear
Thy own heart beat with love and doubt and fear;
To hear at last his step, and rise to greet
The one thy heart yearns fondly thus to meet;
To think of him when absent, and to pray
For grace to guide him on his per'lous way.

To hear him praised for deeds of goodness done;
To see him envied, and to know thou'st won
His pure, fond love, and that whate'er betide,
In weal or woe, thy place is by his side;
To love him better in misfortune's hour
Than in his youthful prime, his day of power;
To feel, though fortune frown, though friends forsake,
Though sorrows overwhelm, thou for his sake
Canst smile at fate and cheer and bless his lot—
"The world forgetting, by the world forgot."
Though sickness bows the form, and dims the eye
Whose glance controlled thy youthful destiny;
Though pain may chafe his spirit e'en to vent
On thee a murmur of its discontent,
Yet o'er his couch wilt thou unwearied bend,
And soothe and bless, though pangs thy bosom rend;
To see him suffer, and to feel and know
That e'en thy love cannot avert the blow.

To watch the livelong night, and weep and pray
For him, the loved one, till the dawn of day;
To see the wasted form, the sunken eye
Still gazing on thee, though imploringly;
To press thy lips upon the pallid brow,
And try to smile, lest grief thy fears avow;
To catch from lips so loved the last faint breath,
Then, shrinking, own the bitterness of death!

OUTWITTING THE BRIGANDS.

It was on such a morning as we fog-nurtured islanders seldom witness at home that I stood upon the deck of the good steamer Coumoundouros, watching the nearing shores of the Piræus, which, as all the world knows, or should know, is the port of the classic city of Athens. The beautiful, unclouded sky; the bright outline of the sun-bathed coast; the air laden with the scent of the distant Hymettus; the far eminence with the grand old Acropolis standing out white and bold in the clear atmosphere, and close at hand the moldering tomb of Themistocles—all combined to rouse such poetic fancies in my mind that I forgot for the moment the prosaic business on which I had come. The screaming engine on the busy little railway, which carries the traveler from the Piræus to Athens, soon reminds me, however, that I was accredited with a mission from a London Greek firm to its friends in the Attic city, and I was soon whirling over the sacred ground—

Where history gives to every rood a page.

We passed the monuments of those doughty champions of the war of independence, Karaiskakis and Miaulis, and many other objects of interest; and, after a ride of three or four miles, I found myself at my destination.

After the first few days I certainly had a very pleasant time of it, the few hours' work each day acting only as a stimulus to my varied pleasures; and, having examined the Acropolis, lunched by the fallen pillar of Jupiter, and seated myself in the ruins of Phyx—whence Demosthenes declaimed and Pericles evolved his plans—I looked around, like Alexander, for more worlds to conquer. I therefore consulted my genial but unwashed host, Kyrie Antonio Pericles Papademetracopoulos—who, although Plato was to him a textbook, and the sayings of Socrates as familiar as the story of Tommy and Harry to an English school boy, was always as dirty as a sweep—upon the propriety of betaking myself to where—

The mountains look on Marathon,
And Marathon looks on the sea.

For one might as well go to Egypt without visiting the pyramids, or to Rome without entering St. Peter's as to "do" Greece and leave Marathon unexplored; and when my host tried to dissuade me by assuring me that a gendarme's ear had been sent a fortnight ago by the brigands to his obstinate relatives, to hurry the negotiations for his ransom, it so roused my blood that I vowed I would go if I returned as close-cropped as an English terrier. So away we started—myself and Themistocles, the son of my host, a sallow, unshaven youth, dirtier than his father—mounted upon two high-spirited donkeys, our revolvers well primed, and the commissariat well stocked.

"Addios Kyrie!" shouted my long-named host as we cantered off.

"Never fear," I replied, waving my revolver defiantly, and feeling that I should be greatly disappointed if the rascals did not show themselves.

On we went enjoying the scenery and holding a hybrid conversation—he in broken English, and I in sadly mutilated Greek—until in the excitement of the ride, and the glorious panorama constantly unfolding itself to our view, I entirely forgot that there were such beings as brigands in existence.

"Now," said I to Themistocles, after a ride of some hours, during which my appetite had become unpleasantly sharpened, "let us look about for a spot where we can bivouac in comfort."

We soon found a delightful place, sheltered all round, save where through a small opening we obtained a view of a charming landscape. Dismounting, and allowing our animals to refresh themselves on the grass, we soon made havoc of the good things we had brought. I was lying upon my back smoking a cigarette after the meal, gazing dreamily at the blue firmament, and being too lazy to rise, had called upon Themistocles to pass the bottle.

"Has the fellow gone to sleep?" thought I, still indisposed to turn my head. "Themistocles!"

But Themistocles heard me not; and when I raised myself upon my elbow, I saw him standing as if struck dumb and motionless with fear, staring upon the opening. Instinctively I leaped up and clutched my revolver, but before I took a step, the cause of Themistocles' fear became apparent, and three shaggy forms behind three blunderbusses aimed directly at me made me fully aware that I was in the presence of those scourges of Greece, the brigands! But, oh, what a metamorphosis! Where were the natty green jackets with silver buttons, the plumed hats, and the tout ensemble of the brigands of my youth, of the operas, and the picture books? Three ragged, disreputable looking figures, clad in greasy sheepskins and dirty clothes, unkempt, unshaven, took the place of those tinseled heroes, and with stern gestures and muttered threats ordered us to follow them. My first thought was resistance, but when I showed the slightest signs, the three bell-mouthed muskets were bent toward me, and I felt that the odds were too many, and, determining to await events, grimly submitted to be led down the mountain by our unsavory guides.

At last, after winding through ravines and hollows, across glens and over mountain paths innumerable, this most unpleasant journey ended, by our guides calling a halt as we gained the summit of an eminence surrounded by trees and tall rocks, forming an extraordinary natural fortress. Beneath our feet, in a deep ravine, with seemingly but one outlet, and excellently sheltered by overhanging foliage, was the camp of the brigands; and here we found the rest of the shaggy ruffians—with the exception of one who stood sentinel—enjoying their siesta with indolent content.

A shrill whistle soon brought the rascals to their feet; and rushing up to meet us they displayed a dozen of as unfavorable specimens of the human race as could be found. Seizing our animals by the bridles, they relieved our captors, and led us down the ravine; and having roughly assisted us to dismount, brought us into the presence of the chief of the band.

"Bravo, lads! excellent, excellent!" he shouted, as his sparkling eyes bent upon us in delight; and after a cursory examination, we were conducted, amid the excited gesticulations of the brigands and without undue ceremony, into a dark tavern within the ravine.

"Shiver my maintops!" exclaimed a voice as I groped my way in; "they might give us sea room, the vagabonds, and not land us in this lubberly creek, and now they are shoving more craft to anchor."

"Haul in, Jack, old chum!" answered the other; "we must make the best of a bad job, mate."

To say that my heart leaped to my mouth at hearing such unexpected words, and finding myself in the company of my own countrymen, would no more than describe the cheering sensation that thrilled through me.

"What cheer, mates," I cried in the darkness. Answering exclamations of astonishment greeted my words, and in a few minutes our stories were told; and I learned that my new found friends were the captain and supercargo of a ship then lying in the port of Piræus, who, seeking a like object, had met with a similar fate to my own.

"And now," said Capt. Jack Jenkins, "how are we to get out of the scrape? If I had Tim, and Joe and Black Tom, each with a cutlass and a barking iron, here, we'd soon make a passage, I'd warrant."

"That's all very well," said Will Johnson, the supercargo, "but we haven't. If I'd but the opportunity given me, I'd guarantee——"

Whatever the supercargo was about to say was cut short by the advent of two shock heads at the little opening of our prison, and two harsh voices calling us—as my guide, Themistocles, informed us—to partake of a feast; for we learned afterward that the chief, in commemoration of having made such a good haul, had decided to allow us, his prisoners, to partake of the general festivity. But as a preliminary, we had to undergo an examination as to our capability of paying the anticipated ransoms. First, we were relieved of our watches and rings, the captain using language rather strong for translation to these pages, to the great amusement of his tormenters, who, with similar gesticulation to his own, endeavored to imitate the sound of the captain's words, which, of course, only added to his wrath and their hilarity.

"You uncombed, dirty-faced vagabonds!" he shouted; "if I had a few of you aboard the Annie Martin, I'd twist your ugly heads over the yardarm in the twinkling of a jiffy!"

Of course they only laughed the louder at his impotent rage; and I thought it quite as well that they did not understand the language in which he gave it vent.

The operation of stripping us of our valuables gave me an opportunity to observe the appearance of my companions. Capt. Jenkins was the beau ideal of an English seaman. In age about thirty-five, of a large and robust build, a face broad, manly, and bearded, and limbs such as would delight a sculptor to copy. His height was nearly six feet; and he had an air of command about him that was doubtless bred of his occupation. The supercargo, Will Johnson, was perhaps ten years younger; nearly as tall as his friend, strong and active; and take us altogether—for I am of no mean stature myself—we were three men who, under any circumstances, would be no disgrace to our country; and if any opportunity should arise for an attempt at an escape, I felt certain we should give as good an account of ourselves as any scratch three, here or there.

Having satisfied themselves of the value of my late father's watch, which I parted from with some emotion, and of the intrinsic worth of the captain's gold chronometer, as well as of the supercargo's watch and diamond ring, we were interrogated, through Themistocles, as to our means. For myself, the name of the firm I was traveling for acted with a talismanic effect upon them, and I was immediately assessed, notwithstanding my protestations, at £300. At this price, too, the captain's freedom was valued; while the unfortunate supercargo—whose business they persisted in confounding with the owner of the cargo and ship—was unanimously voted to be worth twice our ransom. Having arranged this matter to their own satisfaction, if not to ours, we were told to sit down and enjoy ourselves with what appetite we could muster.

The smell of the roast lamb and the freshly baked meal cakes, however, soon aroused pleasant sensations, and dimmed for a time the memories of our griefs; more especially as, under the apparent certainty of obtaining his booty, the chief condescended to be quite patronizing toward us, carving the joint himself for us, and delicately handing on the point of a dagger our several portions. After we had satisfied our hunger with the more solid viands, we were regaled with dried fruits as dessert; and a large jar of a peculiar sherry-colored but bad-tasting wine of a resinous flavor—which Themistocles described as the common wine of the country—was brought in and set in the midst of us. This we told them we could not drink; and the chief very generously ordered us a couple of bottles from his own particular store, doubtless the proceeds of a raid upon some well-to-do householder.

Will Johnson after a time managed to ingratiate himself in the favor of our shaggy host and his friends by his genial, happy manner and frank bearing, favoring the company with many remarks, which, translated by Themistocles, evidently pleased them. When, too, by sleight of hand—in which he was an adept—he performed some simple tricks, and gave them a music hall song with a rollicking chorus, and wound up with a hornpipe, accompanied by the captain with a pocket comb and a piece of paper, the general enthusiasm knew no bounds, and the beetle-browed vagabonds laughed till the tears rolled down their cheeks.

Will now became on such excellent terms with them all that he proceeded to take some freedom with them; and when he snatched the horn from the cup bearer, and installed himself in that official's place, lading the wine out of the wide-mouthed jar and handing it round to the company, his triumph was complete.

"For heaven's sake," said he, as he passed us, "don't take any of this stuff, and don't drink much of your own."

"Never fear," said Jenkins, making a wry face; "one taste is sufficient."

And so Will went around with the cup, making a comical remark to this one, and a grimace at that, until the chief—evidently fearing from their hilarity that they were taking too much—ordered them to desist from drinking and return to their several duties.

Meanwhile, we were sent back to our dungeon, with a sentinel stationed at the opening.

"Not a word," whispered Will, as we settled down in our prison. "Here's something, captain," he continued, "that belongs to you."

"Why," said the captain in reply, as Will handed him the article mentioned, "this is a stopper out of my medicine chest."

"To be sure it is, Jack," returned Will, "and I must apologize for taking your laudanum phial; but my confounded back tooth was so painful on board the ship last night that I got up and took it, and luckily forgot to return it this morning. You must debit me with the bottle and its contents, as I dropped them both into the vagabond's wine jar!"

"What!" we all exclaimed in a breath.

"Now, stop your clappers!" said the supercargo. "Jack, you know I'm not bad at sleight of hand tricks. Well, in the first place, having contrived to secrete the bottle while the blackguards were relieving me of my valuables, and then having attained the position of waiter, what was easier than to wriggle the bottle down my sleeve, whip out the stopper, and drop the lot into their swipes, giving the bottle a crack and stirring the laudanum up every time I dipped the horn in it!"

"Bravo, Will!" cried the captain, seizing his hand and giving it a hearty shake. "If that's the case, we're safe; for the black-faced rascals won't wake up for a dozen hours, I'll be bound. There! our guard has dropped off already!"

And, sure enough, the drowsy ruffian had planted himself right across the opening, and was snoring loudly.

"Now for it!" cried the impetuous Jack Jenkins, rising.

"Hold hard!" said Will. "Let them get well off."

So, settling ourselves down for half an hour, we talked the matter over. At the end of this time we sent the trembling Themistocles to see how things were outside, and, after peeping over the prostrate sentinel, he gave us to understand that all were sleeping except three, and that they were retiring to the further end of the ravine, and would in a minute be out of sight.

"Capital!" said Will, with suppressed excitement. "Now, each take a pistol and a cutlass from the fellows and follow me."

One after the other we stepped across the sleeping brigand at the entrance, Will relieving him of his pistol, dirk and blunderbuss, while the captain and I stood ready to give him his quietus at the slightest signs of his waking. Then the four of us, gliding like ghosts, assisted ourselves to whatever weapons we could most easily lay hands upon; and as Themistocles was not of much use for fighting, we gave him the bags containing our valuables—which we found by the side of the sleeping chief—as well as several spare pistols, to carry. Picking our way without speaking a word we advanced toward the open end of the ravine, and, just as we turned round a jutting piece of rock we saw the three sentinels seemingly in earnest conversation.

"Halt!" whispered Will. "Now for a rush!" and each singling out his man and clutching his rifle by the barrel—for we avoided the noise of shooting—we sprang forward. Almost simultaneously, and before the enemy had time to observe us, we were upon them, and three rifle stocks descended upon three shock heads with such force that two of the fellows dropped like stones. The stock of my rifle glanced off the hard head of my antagonist and crushed against the rock. With a stifled cry, he turned; but in an instant my hand was upon his throat, and the sound died in his gullet, while with the strength of desperation I dashed his head against the wall-like rock, and after a struggle, in which he wounded me with his dagger, he fell from my grasp, apparently lifeless.

"Now," said the captain, "where are the donkeys? Come, Greeky!" he cried to Themistocles, "bear a hand;" and, looking around, we espied our four animals just as we left them, but with a brigand sitting by them. Here was an unlooked for rencontre! He was fully a hundred yards off, and to get at him we should have to cross a small plateau.

"Leave him to me," cried Jenkins, preparing to rush forward. But, under the advice of the supercargo, he stopped. We could have picked him off easily, but dared not for the noise of the rifles.

"Hang it!" impatiently muttered Jenkins, "we shall be trapped again;" and without further parley the impetuous fellow started off, running on the tips of his toes, with a drawn cutlass in one hand and a pistol in the other. Just as he was within a few yards of the brigand the latter turned, and, seeing how matters stood, made for his rifle, which was leaning against a tree a few feet off; but a revolver hurled deftly by Will Johnson—for we had all followed—catching him directly in the face, so effectually stopped his progress that he fell stunned to the ground.

"You persist in doing all the work," said Jenkins, as we came up to him. "But quick, lads; off we go!" and in a moment we were, under the guidance of our Greek companion, making with breakneck speed for Athens. Up hill, down dale, on we went for a couple of hours without stopping or meeting a human being; then, just as we were about to cross the summit of a mountain at which we had arrived, a harmless looking peasant wished us "Good day," and was about to pass on.

"Seize him!" cried Themistocles; "he's a scout."

"So seize him we did, for caution's sake, and, as there were no trees near, we tied his hands and legs together, and left him begging for mercy. But there was no mercy in us, more especially as Themistocles explained that there was a curious mysterious connection between the brigands and villagers; that it was by no means unlikely—had we allowed him to go free—he would have hied to the nearest village and roused a swarm of semi-brigands about us.

Having traveled for four hours we called a halt, and after resting ourselves and watering our animals we continued our journey until late at night, we reached Athens, where, round the hospitable board of our host, we soon forgot our troubles.

TALES FOR TODDLERS.

The Trees in Silver Land.

O softly falling flakes of snow
That fill the wintry air,—
A thickening cloud on every side,
Each flake a wonder rare.

"Are they from trees in Silver Land?"
My child is asking me.
He claps his hands, he laughs, he—
"One leaf from silver tree."

Such questions as he asks in vain
About the leaf-like snow!
He might as well talk of the tide
That strangely come and go.

"Who plants those fairy trees?" he—
"With tops that reach so high?"
Oh, answer, Garden of Delight,
All in the cloudy sky!

"Who shakes those trees and sends the—
On field and wood and town?
Is it the gardener living there,
Or winds that blow them down?"

O child, look up and see yourself,
The clouds are Silver Land.
Who made those flakes; He scatters
They fall at His command.

They fall, they melt, they come agai—
And His the gardener's hand
That gently shakes the silver trees
Which grow in Silver Land.

Afraid of Spiders.

Carrie jumped from her seat because a spider was spinning down before her from the ceiling. "They are such hateful black things!" she said.

"They are curious things," said Aunt Nellie. "They have eight fixed eyes."

"Dear me! And maybe she's looking at me with all eight of them!" groaned Carrie.

"They are very fond of music—"

"I shall never dare to sing again, for fear they'll be spinning down to listen."

"They can tell whether the weather is going to be fine or not. If it is going to storm, they spin a short thread; if it will be clear, they spin a long one."

"That's funny."

"They are an odd family," Aunt Nelly went on. "I saw one on the window-pane the other day. She carried a little gray silk bag about with her wherever she ran. She had spun the bag herself. When it burst open, ever so many tiny baby spiders tumbled out, like birds from a nest, and ran along with her. Perhaps you didn't know that the spider can spin and sew, too. She spins her web, and she sews leaves together for her summer house."

"What a queer thing a spider is," said Carrie, beginning to forget her dislike.

"Yes; and she has a queerer sister in England, who makes a raft, and floats on pools of water upon it in search of flies for her dinner."

"I should like to know what it is made of."

"She binds together a ball of weeds with the thread she spins."

"I wish we could go to England."

"And there's another of the family who lives under water in a diving bell, which she weaves herself."

"How I should like to see her!"

"May be you would rather see the one in the West Indies who digs a hole in the earth. She lines it with silk of her own making, and fits a door to it, which opens and closes when the family goes out."

"Yes, yes," said Carrie, "how delightful!"

"But you would be afraid of the inmates?"

"Perhaps not, now I know their family affairs."

The Monkey's Story.

My name is Mingo. I had a sister named Chippy. We were born in South America. We are called spider monkeys, and all of us have beautiful long tails. Chippy and I lived in a cocoanut tree. We were very happy. We did nothing but play, and eat, and sleep. We chattered all the time in a very loving manner, and never quarreled. I was always kind to Chippy, and she never scratched and bit. That was what made our home so happy. We were both good monkeys, and father and mother loved us. Such fine times as we did have! Awake bright and early, we washed our faces, and took a drink of cocoanut milk. It was very nice. Then we hunted for bird's-eggs for breakfast, or perhaps caught some tender beetles or dragon-flies. After that we spent our days in playing hide-and-seek among the branches of the trees, or teased the lazy crocodiles basking in the sun by the river side. But we never strayed far from home, for our parents had warned us not to do so, for fear of cruel men. One day, when father and mother had gone out to walk, we heard strange sounds near us. Stealing to an open space, Chippy and I saw a company of men gazing up at us. We started to run away, but it was too late. I felt something around my neck like a snake. I soon found that one of the men had thrown a rope over me, and I was captured.

What became of Chippy I do not know. I have never seen her since. I can just remember being placed in a dark box, in which I was kept prisoner for many long days and nights. When I was set at liberty I was upon a ship, with water all around me. I was sold to my present master, and by him, after many beatings, I was taught the little tricks which please the boys and girls. They seem very silly to me now. During the long hot summer days we tramp over dusty roads and play the same tiresome tunes and perform the same tricks. Sometimes we have a good day, and then I get a crust of bread or a bun for supper. Often the days are bad, and I go to bed hungry and dream of the happy days in the cocoanut grove by the Amazon.

Georgie's Pic-Nut.

George Laws waked fresh and bright from his afternoon nap. He didn't stand quite as still as a mouse while his mamma washed and dressed him, because he was in a hurry. He was going to have a "pic-nut," as he called it. The only picnic he knew anything about was one autumn day. Then he went with his papa and mamma to pick up nuts, after Jack Frost had bitten them from the boughs. He has played "pick-nut" very often since, under the old apple tree in the yard.

As he bends over the crib and kisses his baby brother good-by, he says, "When you get older, Eddie, you shall have a pic-nut too. You have no belowest teeth yet, and you can't eat. It wouldn't be any pic-nut at all if you couldn't eat, you know."

Baby laughs, kicks his little feet, and beats the air with his tiny fists. He looks as though he didn't care to go to a pic-nut.

Georgie harnesses his milk-white goat to his pretty red wagon. He puts his basket of lunch into it, with his two kittens, playing they are his children. Then he climbs upon the seat, takes the reins, and off they go.

Rab runs along in front, barking with delight. The chickens follow, for they have learned that where Georgie's pick-nut is there will be plenty of cake and cracker crumbs.

A Costly Infant.

Edward King's Paris Letter: Sarah is—yes, the news is now confirmed—in an interesting situation. And, furthermore, M. Damala is not going for a soldier, but means to stay at home and dandle upon his knee the boy or girl, as it may happen to be. Madame Bernhardt-Damala has engagements every night for the next ten months. She has heavy forfeit money to pay if she violates one of her contracts; consequently, the birth of her infant Damala will presumably cost the family something like 100,000 francs. What an expensive menage! M. Damala can, nevertheless, congratulate himself on having married a woman who has an excellent head for business. She will pay her debts, and be rich again. Her incessant activity and wonderful endurance give ample guarantee of this.

Soliloquy of a Wife "of the Period."

"Oh! would I could live where there's nothing to do—
Nothing like working the whole year through!
No cooking to manage, no dishes to wash,
No children to see to, and all that bosh.

"No sweeping, no dusting, no making of beds,
No mending of garments all worn into shreds;
No darning old stockings, no knitting of new,—
Such work is just horrid, the catalogue through.

"I would banish all washing and ironing days,
Their suds-reeking air and their steam-chilling haze.
With scrubbing and churning and baking of bread,
I'd have nothing to do—I would rather be dead.

"It can't be my duty, I'm sure it is not,
Contentment to feel with so hateful a lot;
With face that is comely and hands that are white,
To shine in society—that is my right.

"Instead of this drudging, my time should be free,
Just to 'dress' and 'go out,' to be seen and to see,
To play the piano, late novels to read,
Ah! that is the life for a lady to lead.

"Poor fool that I was when I married for love,
Prizing husband and home other pleasures above;
I now know that wealth must accompany these
If a lady, who marries, would live at her ease.

"Next time when I marry—it may come some day
When this dear, good old husband gets out of the way,—
I must know there is money enough and to spare
To save me this horrible house-keeping care."

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

Practical Cookery.

New York Tribune: At her school of cookery last Monday, Miss Parloa began the morning lesson by cutting the tenderloin from a sirloin roast, or what is commonly called in New York a porterhouse roast. The piece weighed about fourteen pounds. When the tenderloin had been removed, the flank also was cut off. It was stated that the fillet—the tenderloin—costs $1 a pound, and that if a fillet be wanted, it is advisable to buy a large roasting piece and obtain the fillet in that way. The flank may be stuffed and rolled, or is good for stewing or braising; the roast serving for a meal some other day. With these introductory remarks, Miss Parloa, using a sharp knife, removed every shred of muscle, ligiment, and thin, tough skin from the fillet, which she then skewered into good shape. With the knife she drew a line through the center of the piece, and then began larding, having two rows of pork, inserted in the two sides of the fillet, meet at the line she had drawn. For the operation a larding needle was, of course, used. The strips of pork were about three inches long and as large round as a lead pencil; they had been kept some time in a bowl of ice to harden. The fillet was well dredged with pepper, salt and flour and put, without water, in a very small pan. For half an hour it was kept in a hot oven. It was stated that on account of the shape of fillets half an hour cooks one weighing either two or six pounds.

Rolled flank of beef was next on the programme. The flank weighed about five pounds. It was carefully wiped with a damp cloth and dredged with salt and pepper. When it lay upon the table one part was seen to be thicker than the other, and some of the meat was cut from the thick portion and laid upon the thin. A dressing was made of a cupful of cracker crumbs, a teaspoonful of summer savory, a tablespoonful of butter, quantities of salt and pepper, and cold water enough to make the cracker quite moist. The meat, having been spread with this dressing, was rolled up, tied and pinned in a cloth. It was placed in a stewpan and just covered with boiling water; and when this water had again reached the boiling point the pan was set back where the water would only bubble. There the meat stood until near the close of the lesson. It was finally allowed to cool in the water in which it was boiled. When nearly cold it was taken up and the cloth was removed, but not the strings. When wholly cold the flank was cut into tender round slices. It was stated that the water could be used as a foundation for a vegetable, rice or tomato soup, or, thickened with flour, could be used as a gravy.

A cupful of water, a cupful of granulated sugar and the juice of a lemon were boiled together for half an hour. Miss Parloa dipped the point of a skewer into the syrup and then into water, and finding that the thread thus formed broke off brittle, announced that the syrup was ready for use on fruit. She pared some oranges, divided them into eighths, and wiped the parts free of moisture. Part of the syrup was poured into a small cup, which was set in a basin of boiling water. The pieces of orange were taken up separately on the point of a skewer and dipped into the syrup, and were afterward placed on a dish that had been buttered lightly. This gave fruit glace. Grapes and nuts were prepared in the same way. Special pains were taken to avoid stirring the syrup, for stirring would have spoiled it.

Before making caramel ice cream, Miss Parloa said that the foundation she was about to prepare was suitable for all kinds of ice cream. Having heated a generous pint of milk to the boiling point, she stirred into it a cupful of sugar, a scant half cupful of flour and two eggs, all beaten together; and the mixture was allowed to cook twenty minutes longer, receiving a frequent stirring. A small cupful of sugar was next put into a small frying pan and stirred over the fire until it turned liquid and began to smoke. It was then turned into the boiling mixture or foundation, which was at once put away to cool. When it became cool a quart of cream was added. Miss Parloa said the flavor of the ice cream could be varied by browning the sugar more or less. The mixture was strained into a freezer, and directions for packing were given. The ice was broken into pieces about as big as a pint bowl and then put into a canvas bag and pounded with a mallet until the pieces were as small as a hen's egg, or even smaller. After the can containing the cream had been properly adjusted in the freezer, a layer of ice five inches deep was packed around it. A liberal sprinkling of rock salt on the ice was the next act. Alternate layers of ice and salt were continued until the tub was full; the packing being pounded with a paddle. The crank of the freezer being turned a few times, caused the ice to settle somewhat, and more was added. For Miss Parloa said that if the packing be solid at first there need be no repacking. She laid especial stress on the fact that the water must not be drawn off. It fills all the crevices and gives the can a complete cold envelope. For a gallon freezer about ten quarts of ice and three quarts of salt are required. With more salt it would take less time for freezing, but the cream would not be so smooth. At first the crank should not be turned very fast, but the speed should be increased as the work becomes harder.

When the cream was finally frozen—as indicated by the extreme difficulty with which the crank was turned—Miss Parloa carefully wiped the salt and ice from the cover of the can and removed the cover without displacing the can itself. The beater was removed and the cream scraped from it, and a large spoon was worked up and down in the can until the cream was light and the space left vacant by the removal of the beater was filled. The cover of the can was replaced, a cork was put in the hole from which the handle of the beater was taken, and the freezer was set aside for a while. When she came to serve the cream, Miss Parloa placed the can for a few seconds in a pan of warm water so that the heat caused the cream to slip out easily upon a dish. She said that if cream is to be molded it should be removed from the can when the beater is removed; and when it is put into the mold it should be worked up and down with a spoon, so that it shall be lightened, and worked into every part of the mold as well. A sheet of white paper should be placed over the cream before the cover of the mold is put on, and the mold should be buried in fresh ice and salt.

Gruels of Wheat, Rice and Indian Corn.

Milk Porridge (a simple food, more nutritious than water porridge, on account of the milk it contains; useful in diarrhœa and dysentery)—Place one and a half pints of milk over the fire to boil in a saucepan in a pan of boiling water, or in a milk boiler, to prevent burning; mix two tablespoonfuls of flour smoothly with half a pint of milk and a level teaspoonful of salt, and stir it into the boiling milk. Let the porridge boil for five minutes, stirring occasionally. If it is desirable to increase the nutriment of the porridge an egg may be beaten smoothly and mixed into the porridge just after it is removed from the fire.

Ground Rice Gruel (a simple nutrient, useful in alternation with flour water gruel, especially if the bowels are slightly relaxed)—Place a quart of water over the fire to boil, with a teaspoonful of salt, and an inch of stick cinnamon; mix two tablespoonfuls of finely-ground rice, or rice flour, with half a cupful of cold water, and stir it into the boiling water; boil it for half an hour, stirring it occasionally to prevent burning. Then strain the gruel and use it. It may be sweetened if the patient's condition will permit. If stimulants are admissible, a small glass of brandy may be added to it.

Whole Rice Gruel (a simple nutrient, like ground rice gruel, useful in diarrhœa, slightly stimulating and strengthening)—Put a quart of water over the fire to boil; pick over and wash two heaping tablespoonfuls of rice in plenty of cold water; then put it into the boiling water, with one teaspoonful of salt, and the yellow rind of a lemon, and boil it for one hour. If the water decreases much in quantity during the boiling, add more to replace what is lost. At the end of an hour strain the gruel, add to it a small glass of brandy, and sweeten it palatably, if sugar is allowed by the physician.

Browned Rice Gruel (a slightly stimulating nutrient, suitable for use in cases of diarrhœa). Pick over, wash clean in plenty of cold water, and [illegible] dry thoroughly four tablespoonfuls of rice. Put it [illegible] a dripping pan in a hot oven, and shaking the pan occasionally to ensure an even [illegible] brown it, [illegible] color. Then put it over the fire in a quart of boiling water, with a teaspoonful of salt, and boil it for an hour. After the expiration of an hour strain it, add a small glass of brandy to the gruel, and a little sugar, if the patient's condition permits its use.

Indian Meal Gruel (useful [illegible] has been taken in the morning, after a cathartic [illegible] one quart of the previous evening)—Place [illegible] to it a teaspoonful of salt; water over the fire to boil, adding [illegible] spoonful of salt; mix two heaping tablespoonfuls of Indian meal with half a cupful of cold water, and stir it smoothly into the boiling water; boil the gruel for half an hour, stirring it occasionally to prevent burning; then use it.

Graham Gruel (like Indian meal gruel it is useful the morning after a cathartic has been taken, but its effect is more laxative, especially if the graham contains much bran)—Boil one quart of water with a teaspoonful of salt; sift into it two tablespoonfuls of graham flour, stirring it to insure smoothness; boil the gruel for half an hour, and then use it. The addition of a tablespoonful of molasses increases its laxative effect.—Juliet Corson.

Needlework Novelties.

Embroidered or painted bellows are very much the fashion now-a-days in London, and no artistic fire place is without them. Neither, one might say, is any bibelot-laden etagere or cabinet without one; the modern use of bellows being not so much to blow fires as to blow the dust from all the daintinesses of artistic boudoirs and drawing rooms. A pair of embroidered or gracefully painted bellows certainly makes the dusting of a room a more æsthetic affair than the service generally rendered cleanliness by a fierce-armed Bridget and her ragged duster, or even her feather brush. These artistic bellows are genuine in every respect, not toy imitations. They are small, with gilded nozzles or nozzles of shining brass and are made of the usual elm wood. When embroidered the upper and under sides are covered all over with silk, satin or velvet, upon which the designs are marked. The silk or velvet is cut to the size and shape required, and the edges, glued or tacked to the edges of the wood, are concealed with a thick row of tiny, brass-headed tacks, or with gold or silver braid. One pair, seen at the London Decorative Needle Work society's room, was covered with delicate blue velvet, and wrought in the ordinary overstitch in exquisitely blended shades of bronze and pale amber silk. The designs were birds, scarcely known to science, but broad-winged and of a graceful aerial poise, and flowers with broad petals and large voluptuous buds. Flowers with birds were outlined with a delicate thread of silver, and a gleam of silver ran all through their forms. Another pair was of dull-yellowish green silk, and was wrought with aquatic birds and broad-disked river flowers lined with gold.

Among the other objects shown at the Needlework society's rooms were the purse-shaped work bags, treated in the modern artistic spirit till they were as pretty adjuncts of a toilet or as melodious notes in a "symphonic" room, as if such were their sole purpose. One was of green satin shooting, a "flatted" green, if one might so say, lined with soft mustard-color silk. It was a full yard in length, and made to hang over the owner's arm, or over the arm of her chair or sofa. There was an applique strip of yellow embroidery shot with gold, with a fringe of gold at each end, and the rings, which slipped back and forth just like an old-fashioned silk purse rings, were heavily worked in purse silk.

The First Baby.

There is probably no moment in a young mother's life when her past education appears so inadequate, as the moment when she is left alone for the first time with her first baby; the sense of responsibility which she then feels weighs upon her like a great burden, and one that is not to be lifted. One question that is likely to disturb her is whether she will continue the use of the flannel band, which is considered essential by most, if not all, nurses. This question gains force and presses for an answer if her husband stands by and remarks that it is a "remnant of barbarism," and it really does seem to be, if it is pinned close enough to keep it in place; no room is left in which the muscles may expand, and if it is not pinned close, it wrinkles and must hurt the infant's tender skin. One way in which the question may be answered is this: there are knit bands, made of the soft Saxony yarn which will "give," and which stay in place remarkably well. In every case where it is possible to do so, substitute the knit band for the close unyielding one of flannel. If the waists of the pinning-blanket and skirts are pinned in front, it is a much easier matter to dress the baby, and besides, even if the latest and best kind of safety-pin is used, there is danger, if pinned at the back, that they will press in a disagreeable manner on the baby's back. Many mothers make the long as well as the short infants' skirts with narrow bands with buttonholes in them, and put waists on the baby with buttons on, just as is usual in the case of children two and three years old; this is a great advantage, as then a soiled skirt can be changed without undressing the child.

Home Decoration.

Long, full undercurtains of lace or Madras muslin are gradually drifting out of fashion. In their stead one sees in most of the new artistic interiors an unbroken sweep of plush, or of raw silk on either side of the window frame, through which the expanse of shining plate glass appears uncovered, save by a shade of embroidered silk or holland. A brass jardiniere, filled with palms and ferns helps to do the work of excluding curious eyes, and the advantage gained by a break in the floor-line and wall space through admission of the window recesses is noticeably good. When thin curtains are necessary, those hung close to the window sash are advisable. Gold-wrought Madras muslin, thin yellow silk, painted and embroidered; and bolting cloth similarly treated, are most employed by artists in decoration.

The simplest method of staining a floor is to get from a dealer in paints half a gallon of oak stain, ready mixed, pour it into a basin, cover a floor with it, using an ordinary hogs' hair paint brush. Do not tread more than you can help on the part you have stained. Of course you would do the floor near the door last. If one wash of the stain does not make as dark a tint as you wish, wait until it is quite dry and then give it a second. When it is quite dry the housemaid can rub it up with beeswax and turpentine, or she may make a mixture of those two ingredients with a little resin warmed until it is all liquid, then, when it is cool, rubbed on with a cloth and polished up with a brush.

Easter Eggs.

To dye eggs, onion skins put in the water in which they are boiled will make them a bright yellow, or if left longer in the solution a rich brown. Logwood or violet ink gives a royal purple. Cochineal, pink and crimson; and many pieces of chintz or bright ribbon that fade easily, if sewed tightly around the eggs will color them nicely in figures, stripes or dots. Another way is to dip the egg into hot water, and then write a name or motto on the shell with tallow. It is then boiled in a solution of dye wood, when the inscription will appear in white upon a colored ground.

Kitchen Keramics.

Any one who is going to have a garden should be planning for it now. The country house wife who "takes care of the pence" will tell you that the tomato plants which she raises from seed planted in a box and set in a sunny window, will be much more thrifty than those from a hot-bed, and will bear more abundantly. Nothing adds more to the appearance of the meat or fish served on the table than a garnish of some suitable plant, and this might be had all through the summer, if a little pains is taken; water-cress, which is so appetizing, may be sown successively. Endive and parsley also are excellent, and may also be sown at different times during the summer. A little plot of ground and an hour's work every day, may be made to yield more than one would suppose, never having made the experiment. One who is curious in such matters kept a strict account, and from a piece of ground one and a half rods by two rods, after paying for the seed and ploughing, had a clear profit of $12.65, besides having the keen enjoyment which comes from eating the fresh vegetables which grew for him.

To insure success in making custard pies, put the crust on the plates, and set the plates in the oven before pouring the custard in. When you have found the place where you wish the pie to remain while baking, pierce the crust with a silver fork in two or three spots, but do not put the fork through the dough to the plate, as the custard will then run under the crust and spoil it. After this is done, pour the custard in; pour it from a pitcher, so that not a drop will be spilled on the rim of crust around the edge of the plate. Now, if you wish this rim to brown nicely, rub it over with a little milk in which you have dissolved a little sugar—a dessert-spoonful of milk will be plenty, and a half a teaspoonful of sugar. If your oven is a good one, the pie will not need to be turned, and this is a great advantage, as the custard will not be disturbed when forming.

The old fashioned grate, dispenser though it is of cheer, is yet a source of discomfort to the woman whose duty it is to keep it looking as it should. The blacking wears off, and a man who can put it on is so inaccessible, when he should be otherwise, that one distracted woman purchased a brush and went to work. She took a few cents' worth of asphaltum and mixed it with equal quantities of benzine and turpentine. When it was of the consistency of paint she dipped her brush in it, and in a short time the grate looked like new again. This preparation can be used to render a coal scuttle less unsightly, and it is surprising to see how many improvements can be brought about by its use.

A delicious tea cake is made by beating half a pound of butter to a cream; to this add an equal quantity of sugar; beat this with the butter until they are well mixed; five well-beaten eggs should then be stirred in, a liberal allowance of flavoring extract and three-quarters of a pound of flour, with a cup and a half of well-washed currants. Put enough of this mixture in the tins so that when done the cakes will be about two inches thick. They must be eaten while fresh to be enjoyed. A good flavoring for these cakes is made by putting peel of Messina oranges in a little pure alcohol and letting it stand for a week or longer.

This recipe for chicken croquettes comes from the notebook of a cook of long experience: Chop the white meat of a cold boiled chicken very fine. Add a well beaten egg, a spoonful of flour, a little salt and a [illegible] cupful of cream stirred in with the chicken. Let this simmer on the back part of the stove for [illegible] minutes, stirring it constantly to keep the cream from scorching. When the batter has thickened to about the consistency of mustard, pour from the saucepan into a shallow pan or dish to cool. When cold [illegible] stiff fashion it in balls or flat cakes, dip in egg [illegible] and in bread or cracker crumbs, and fry in hot fat.

Spanish short-cake is excellent for tea. Take three eggs, half cup of butter, [illegible] one cup of sugar, two-thirds of a cup of sweet [illegible] a little cinnamon, two cups of flour and one teaspoonful of baking powder; stir the flour in—do not knead it; the eggs, butter and sugar should be beaten together till very light. Bake in a shallow tin; when it is done spread a thin frosting over the top; make this of the white of one egg, a little pulverized sugar and a teaspoonful of cinnamon; set it in the oven to brown.

How many little things one might do if they were only suggested to one at the proper time. Here is one of the many: The high chair for the baby is always too large at first. This is a wise provision for growth, but not always a comfortable one, but it may be made so by making a padded covering for the seat and back of the chair. The smaller the child, the thicker the cushions should be. Thus a chair that is large enough for a child of five may hold an infant of a few months.

To prevent the hair from falling out try first wetting the head at night with salt and water. Have the salt dissolved in the water, so that it will not annoy you by particles sticking to your hair. Mild sage tea is also excellent. If these remedies do not affect a speedy cure, try this: Get a little bottle of brandy, and put in all the salt that it will absorb—wet the head with this two or three times a day.

A delicious pudding is made thus: Sift two tablespoonfuls of flour, and mix with the beaten yolks of six eggs, add gradually one pint of sweet cream, a quarter of a pound of citron cut in very thin slices, and two teaspoonfuls of sugar; mix thoroughly, pour into a buttered tin, and bake twenty-five minutes. Serve with wine or vanilla sauce.

An easily-prepared dessert is made of tapioca; it hardly seems appropriate to call so dainty a dish of pudding. Soak a cupful of tapioca for an hour in cold water, then boil, adding warm water enough to allow it to expand; when tender sweeten it, and take from the fire, add an orange cut in small bits for flavoring. Serve with cream.

Lace crochet of the popular macreme cord is much used for the edge of curtains of canton flannel or of cretonne, or of any material which has sufficient body to need so heavy an edge.

The livers of chickens and turkeys are nice fried with a few thin slices of bacon. Cut the liver and bacon very thin; season with pepper and salt. This is a good breakfast dish.

Starch makes a better paste to use in papering walls than flour, and is less expensive also; a little will go so much further.

If drawn butter is sent to the table with fish send also a lemon, or, if need be, lemons, cut in small pieces, not slices.

JESUS WENT BEFORE.

Their faces to Jerusalem,
They stepped with laggard feet,
Half, timorous, defiant half,
At what they went to meet.
But as they rested, or they talked
Their sad forebodings o'er,
Still leading on the little band,
Their Master went before.

He saw in vision maddened throngs,
He saw the crowded hall
Where scribe and priest should mock and flout,
Where cruel scourge should fall.
He saw the cross; its shadows lay
The toilsome pathway o'er,
But pressing on with ardent soul,
The Master went before.

To-day thy pledged disciples, Lord,
Meet sorrow, pain and shame.
Their watchword in the trial time
Thine own all-conquering name.
Though flesh be weak and spirit faint,
And heart be spent and sore,
They cannot fail in any strife
While thou shalt go before.

In presence of thy bitter foes,
In midst of dark defeat,
They yet shall snatch a victory
And taste a triumph sweet.
Nor death itself shall crush them, Lord,
Its final conflict o'er,
The ransomed hosts shall shout and sing,
"Our Savior went before."

FOR RELIGIOUS REFLECTION.

Chinamen in Boston.

"It is more than seven years ago," says the Boston Journal, "since Miss Harriet Carter, in the course of her missionary work, became interested in the Chinese of the city, and formed a class for the purpose of teaching them. They met at first in the Old Colony chapel on Monday evenings, during the summer at Miss Carter's house in Cambridgeport, then in Chambers Street chapel, and finally, in 1879, the school took up its abode in the vestry of Mount Vernon church, where it has since remained. There were only two pupils at the outset, but the work has increased steadily, and now, with the day school which was established later, it more than fills the heart and hands of Miss Carter, who still remains its devoted and energetic head. No matter how busy Miss Carter may be in her work of supervision, she contrives to greet cordially each pupil or new-comer. It is good to see their evident affection for her. In speaking about her to others they evince a warm appreciation of what she has done for them, and a respect that amounts almost to veneration. 'She ver' kin',' they say, 'she Chinaman fren'.' With the exception of the Bible class, into which are grouped a half dozen of the more advanced pupils, the instruction is necessarily individual, each scholar having his own teacher and lessons suited to his particular needs. Moral instruction is, of course, the great end in view, and, as the best means to that end, they are taught to read, write and speak English. The books used are Bibles, dictionaries, hymn books, readers of various grades, etc., printed in English or Chinese, or both; but the New Testament is the most popular text book among them. The slate and pencil are also quite indispensable, since, besides other uses, they serve as copy-book and pen. It is perhaps needless to say that the pupils learn to write very rapidly because of their wonderful powers of imitation. But there are also concerted exercises for the school, such as singing hymns, repeating the Lord's Prayer, and reading the commandments. Some of the hymns which are translated into Chinese have been printed in a sort of phonetic English, so that both pupils and teachers pronounce the Chinese. How does it sound? Here is the first stanza of 'There is a happy land,' one of their favorite hymns:

Gom yee yetsor folk dee,
Doy ye yourn fong;
Sing tone ye wing jone Key
Goee got jese gwong.
Foon hern don ba bone gore,
Quoy wing k g gone yorn poor;
Key sing hearn leern goe war,
Don bee mo keern.

Dr. Hall's Sensible Advice.

The Rev. Dr. John Hall of New York gave some excellent advice last week to the students of the Yale Theological seminary in New Haven. He advised the clergy above all things to be cautious about using hard language. "There are words which have an acquired sense which might be used in that sense sometimes, but when such a word was used it should be with a qualification. One of these words, very common in the ordinary speech of people, was the word 'infidel,' and it was frequently misused. We should look to the original meaning of words. We could say of the statements of a person that we are without confidence in them, and it may be wiser that to call a man an infidel because he says what we do not believe. Just such a word is 'skeptic.'" Dr. Hall said that he had always been a skeptic in a certain sense. So was every one with a mind capable of judging evidence. "This principle of examining was right—the Bible teaches us to prove all things. We properly welcome truth upon evidence and are skeptical. True, we do not attempt to prove everything by the same kind of evidence. The scientific investigator has a class of evidence to prove a certain class of facts—he uses material facts to prove the truth of his material theories. A man looks at the presentation of evidence suitable to settle a certain matter. Let us not fear that we are sceptics, but that we do not look at the appropriate kind of evidence for the given case. Another word," said the speaker, "that should be used with caution, is 'secularism.' In the true sense of that word it was proper to be secular. We are all secularists in a way. Christian secularism is the hope of the world, the inspiration of goodness, charity and all excellent things."

Revivalist Harrison's Charges.

Revivalists, it seems, do not save souls for nothing. The Inter-Ocean thus speaks of one of them: "If all the stories that are told about him are true, the revivalist Harrison, who has recently been ministering to the people of Decatur, should pray earnestly to be delivered from the sin of covetousness. Almost everywhere he goes he gets into a row about his pay. He charges $100 a week for leading lost sheep into the fold, and insists upon payment in advance. While in Decatur he made short trips into neighboring towns to hold single meetings, for which his terms are $25, and when the committee on finance attempted to deduct the amount he had received for outside meetings while he was in their employment, to use an ungodly expression, he 'kicked,' and demanded his full price per week, whether he gave full service or not. The disposition to mingle cupidity with a desire to rescue wayward souls has made Mr. Harrison considerable trouble heretofore. Last summer the good people of an Ohio town erected and furnished a house for him, wherein he might rest from his labors when his flesh grew weak, and were very much astonished to discover that he sold it and pocketed the money as soon as the property was conveyed to him."

Religion in Colorado.

The Rev. Dr. Hayes, pastor of the Central Presbyterian church of Denver, Col., in a recent lecture said that Christianity in Colorado is very unaggressive. Never before in the religious world has there been seen so much self-complacency and content as is displayed by the church people of Colorado. The great disorganization which exists is taken advantage of by the skeptic and the atheist, and the result is that church people are in the background. When an office is to be filled the Methodist refuses it because he is afraid of exciting the jealousy or dislike of the Presbyterian; the latter cannot fill the position because he is afraid of exciting the displeasure of the Baptist and Methodist, and so on. And now comes the skeptic. He says: "Gentlemen, I am the man you are looking for; I believe in nothing, and I am the right man in the right place." His arguments appear to be correct, and he is given the place, to the exclusion of a professing Christian, who could administer the affairs of the office with more purity of thought and action. The inactivity of Christians makes skepticism a good plea by which to accumulate financial wealth; therefore, an increase in skeptics may be looked for, especially among the young.

Droppings from the Sanctuary.

I shall not want: whate'er is good,
Of daily bread or angel's food,
Shall to my father's child be sure
So long as earth or heaven endure.

Rev. Dr. Wilder, in the Missionary Review for November and December, 1882, gives the following totals of 100 different churches and societies: American home strength, 77,953 ministers, and 10,165,976 communicants; missionaries ordained 844, lay 77, women 978; native workers ordained 839, others 7,359; native communicants 197,102. Europeans, home strength, 39,746 ministers, 16,638,877 communicants; missionaries ordained 1,756, lay 549, women 628, native workers ordained 1,118, others 14,730; native communicants 377,619. Total, missionaries ordained 2,600, lay 625, women 1,606; native workers ordained 1,957, others 22,089, native communicants 574,721; income $8,447,991.

The National Woman's Christian Temperance union, with its thirty-one auxiliary State and two Territorial unions, is the largest society ever composed exclusively of women, and conducted entirely by them. The number of local unions is about 3,000, with a membership of about 50,000, and a large number of juvenile organizations. This society is the lineal descendant of the great temperance crusade of 1873-4, and is a union of Christian women of all churches, for the purpose of educating the young; forming a better public sentiment; reforming the drinking classes; and prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Denominational lines are not drawn as closely as they once were. In the thirteen years since the reunion, the Presbyterian church of the United States has received from other churches no less than 716 ministers, or an average of fifty-five each year. They came chiefly from Scotland, Ireland, England and Canada, with a very few from the continent. Many came from other Presbyterian bodies, a considerable number from the Congregationalists, and a few from the Methodists, Lutherans and Episcopalians.

The Unitarian club of Boston, Mass., at their meeting discussed the subject of a building for the American Unitarian association. It is decided to erect a building to cost $150,000, in addition to what may be expected from the association. The building will not be begun until all funds necessary are subscribed. A committee of two in each church to solicit subscriptions will be appointed.

In Telugu, the American Baptists have a most productive field. In the first three months of 1882 they baptized 1,500 converts; during 1881 2,163; and in the year previous 2,753, and this field now aggregates 22,000 Christians. In mud and rain candidates for baptism often come a distance of 100 miles or more on foot, but often in a company of 200, not more than ten, and frequently only one or two are from the same village.

The revival which is in progress at Decatur, Ill., under the ministrations of the Rev. Mr. Harrison, is remarkable. The revival has been in progress over ten weeks, and 1,200 persons have professed conversion. The first meeting of the day is held at 6 a. m., and as many as 600 persons have been present at that hour. Persons have come a distance of 100 miles to attend the meetings.

It is stated by a writer in The New York Evangelist that since the union of the Old and New School Presbyterian churches, thirteen years ago, 716 ministers have been received from other denominations, and 319 have withdrawn to other denominations.

The next English Church congress will be held at Reading, near Oxford, in October. A temporary building, to hold 2,500 persons, will be erected for the purpose.

The chaplain of the Hampton Institute says there has been a noteworthy revival among the students, more than eighty of whom have been recently converted.

Gladstone's Vulgar American.

London St. James' Gazette: Our American cousins are truly astounding in many ways, but in none more so than in their craze for interviewing celebrities. One or two Sundays ago, at Cannes, a party of Americans, utter strangers, accosted Mrs. Gladstone as she was coming out of church, and expressed their desire to interview Mr. Gladstone at the Chateau Scott. She, too good-naturedly, said that they might call on the next afternoon. This was afterward found to be inconvenient on account of other engagements, so a letter was written to say that it was much regretted that Mr. Gladstone had previously made plans for the next few days. However, at the end of the week the party took the chateau by storm. Mr. Gladstone was dragged out of his sanctum and interviewed, and made to give his autograph. He then as quickly as possible withdrew into his shell, and Lady Wolverton, an ever-courteous hostess, though an invalid, was handed over to them till they chose to retire. This is not quite all, for there is a garden, a very beautiful private one near the chateau, in which, by the courtesy of the owner, Mr. Gladstone and the chateau party are privileged to walk. The Americans went there, announcing themselves as great friends. Their conduct was such that, I understand, an apology had to be sent to Chateau Scott.

"Pschutt."

Boston Advertiser: French "chic" has been displaced by "pschutt." The fact is worth noticing because the term chic has barely entered the language of England and the United States when the Parisians discard it as one throws away an old hat or the daily paper of yesterday evening. The Imperial dictionary mentions chic, for which it asks the sound of sheek. Fine people use pschutt to denote ease, grace, taste in talk, dress, or manner—that element which marks the people of the world. One may be very correct, or even elegant, and yet lack pschutt. A lady may have grace and winning manners without possessing pschutt. To have pschutt, dress and manners must be perfect harmony with the person; they must show agreeable individuality, and they must be successful. Pschutt is usually born with people, but can be improved with experience and skill. It is impossible to have pschutt, save among pleasant people, just as one cannot chat pleasantly with a boor or a dogmatic professor. The Parisian wits applied the term pschutt at one time to overdose limbs, then to young men whose coats were stuffed to improve the figure. Such persons are now called boudinee. All men who wear corsets are called boudinee in Paris. But men who attend to their dress just as the best artists like it are now called pschutteux. Chic is dead, at least in Paris; but pschutt is the correct thing to have.

If your throat feels sore or uncomfortable, use promptly Dr. Jayne's Expectorant. It will relieve the air passages of all phlegm or mucous, allay inflammation, and so give the affected parts a chance to heal. No safer remedy can be had for all coughs and colds, or any complaint of the throat or lungs, and a brief trial will prove its efficacy.

Polk County Journal.

H. E. COOKE, Publisher.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

Washington is a very dull place since the adjournment of congress, but the correspondents are obliged to furnish the daily supply of what passes for news, but which as a rule, is simply bits of gossip, of no value whatever. It is safe to say that between now and next December every leading journal will have to pay for at least one hundred columns of pure speculation in regard to the next speaker of the House—and this is only one of the fruitful topics for specials.

Congress failed to pass a bankruptcy bill, although it was demanded by the commercial interests of the country. The failures for the year 1882 averaged over 200 per week, and since 1883 came in the common death rate has been considerably greater that that of the year previous. The complicated and widely differing insolvency laws of the various states are a perpetual annoyance to both creditor and debtor, and there seems to be an imperative need of a uniform system that shall do justice to these classes.

A prominent journal which devotes much space to the interests of farmers discourses at length on early and late planting, concludes what it is the early crop which has far the greatest security of being a full crop. It is not once in ten times that a late crop has advantage over the early one. The other nine time it is certain the early planting is most productive. Drouths nearly always come late in the season, and if the corn is then not well advanced no amount of work will bring it out. If the season is wet the early planting may be cultivated at the very earliest day when the season permits, while the late crop is not yet up. Therefore every day in the early season is of especial value.

The highest agricultural authority in England gives a very gloomy forecast of the prospective crops of 1883. In consequence of continued rains, great injury has been done to the wheat. There is no spring-sowed wheat crop in England; there may be a resowing, but of necessity and not of a spring-sowed crop. The anticipation is that the failure of this year will be greater than that of any recent year. Then it is remembered that for six or seven years prior to 1882 the failure of the wheat crop was yearly disastrous, the apprehensions now entertained are serious enough. In addition, the cattle of Scotland and England are so generally diseased that the Privy Council has taken order in relation to the matter, The effect of a largely deficient crop would, of course, be to enhance the amount of supply required from other countries, the United States being, if not first looked to, inqured of concurrently with Russia and other countries as to supply and price. If we have fair crops and can sell our supplies at such prices as will well renumerate the farmer, and still sell at home at such prices as the consumer can afford to pay we shall be in a very comfortable position.

Since the disappearance of the paper fractional currency there has been no convenient way of sending small sums of money by mail. This want is met by a law passed at the last session of congress providing for the transmission of small sums in a more convenient and cheaper way than by postal money order. The postal note consists of a piece of paper about the size of an ordinary bank note with rows of figures for date, dollars and cents printed on it, very much as they are upon duplicate tickets issued by conductors on railway trains. These figures are punched to the necessary amount by the postmaster. The charge is three cents, and the note is good for three months from the last day of the month of issue. The same act authorizes the issue of money orders for sums of less than one hundred dollars, at rates varying from eight cents for a ten dollar order to forty-five cents for one of one hundred dollars. The system of postal notes has been in operation in Great Britain for two years and has proved entirely successful. Our proposed note is much more convenient than the British. The notes will be ready about the first o September next.

An intelligent Bostonian was greatly impressed, as other travelers have been, with what he saw and heard at Salt Lake, of the Mormons. Barring the question of the plurality of wives he saw no reason why the Mormons should not be accepted as a legitimate and very devout sect of the Protestant church. The same hymns are sung, the same doctrine preached, the same necessity for salvation emphasized, and justification by faith is made the corner stone of redemption. Of course, there are endless ceremonies and peculiarities in the Mormon church, in which the sects have no part; for example, its Freemasonry. The founders were generally Freemasons, and this has brought about a state of affairs without parallel. Humanely speaking, the world has never seen a greater success than Mormonism. It took for its abode a desert, and has made of it a Paradise. Its system of irrigation is similar to that of Egypt, the water from the snows and springs of the mountains being the substitute for that of the Nile. It improved upon the system of its Puritan ancestry in that it has always recognized the need of the people for amusement, and the theater has ever been a pet institution of its great prophet, Brigham Young. Thus, armed with the religious faith of enthusiasts, lacking none of the necessities, yet coveting none of the luxuries, of material life, their minds diverted by theatrical and other social pleasures, wise in their application of the principles of political economy, and united by obedience to a theocracy to a degree impossible in any community where self-government prevails, the Mormons are a strong community, and to human foresight will be stronger and more powerful as time passes.

Arunan Hunnington, who died recently at Brentford, Ontario, bequeathed $200,000 to the state of Vermont, without directing how the munificent gift should be applied.

WASHINGTON NEWS NOTES.

More bungling has been discovered in the new tariff bill, by which the law abolishing charges is made to go into effect at once. The rate was raised on crockery to compensate for this change, but it does not take effect until July 1. This means the importation of a year's supply of foreign crockery between now and July at a saving of 10 per cent. upon all goods brought in after that date. The pottery manufacturers have complained to the treasury department, but there is no relief, as it was simply a bungle which could not be otherwise construed.

A. B. Stickney of Minnesota, with his two daughters, arrived here Thursday from Florida and is stopping at Willard's. He will soon leave for the northwest. Hon. M. H. Dunnell and family have gone to Fortress Monroe to spend a few days and enjoy the hot salt water baths.

President Arthur has received a letter from Berlin enclosing 1,000 marks from prominent bankers of that city for the flood sufferers in this country. The money was turned over to the representatives in Washington of the order of the Red Cross for distribution.

Controller Knox will shortly pay to the depositors of the Freedman's bank, another and a final dividend of 7 per cent. out of the remaining assets of that insolvent corporation. Dividends amounting in the aggregate to 65 per cent. have already been paid.

New York men are buying largely of Washington real estate. A party of the Corcoran home block was sold the other day to a Mr. Paine for $5 a square foot. He will build a French flat on the lot.

Col. Dudley, not being satisfied with the amount of work heretofore turned off by some of his clerks, has established the rule that hereafter each clerk must turn out so many cases per day.

Secretary Teller has requested the secretary of war to detail a military guard for the protection of the Yellowstone park property. Secretary Lincoln promised to comply with the request.

Immigrant Traffic for This Season.

The following is a correct table of the rates agreed upon for the transportation of immigrant outfits from Chicago, Milwaukee, Sheboygan, Racine, Kenosha, Joliet, Burlington, Muscatine, Davenport, Clinton, Rock Island and Moline to designated points in the Northwest, by way of the Manitoba line: To Fergus Falls, Wahpeton and Breckenridge, per car, $65; to Glyndon, Moorhead, Fargo, Davenport, Dublin, Everest, Casselton and Hope, $70; to Crookston, Mayville, Grand Forks, Portland and Hillsboro, $73; to Larimore and Bartlett, end of Devil's Lake extension, $80; to Warren, $81; St. Thomas, $88; Hamilton, $90; Hallock, $91; Bathgate, $93; St. Vincent, $95. The rates from St. Louis, Peoria, Bardstown, Alton, Hannibal, Keokuk and Quincy are $10 additional. On the Northern Pacific the rates to Fargo and all points between Fargo and Crystal Springs, inclusive are $70; Bismarck, $77; Mandan and Carrington, end of the Jamestown Northern, $80; Richardson, $90; Little Missouri, $103; Glendive, $115; Miles City, $125; Billings, $140 and Livingston, $150. The reductions, it should be remembered, apply to through rates only. They are from $12 to $35 per car less, but do not affect local rates between Chicago and St. Paul inclusive.

Dakota and the Administration.

Associated Press dispatch from Washington: It is said that the administration does not regard with favor the condition of affairs in the territory of Dakota in some particulars. It is reported the aggregate of bonded indebtedness voted by the legislature this winter is not less than $750,000. It is not believed that the imposition of such a debt is warranted in a single session for the purposes for which it was voted, and that such proceedings will prove in the future to be an obstruction in dividing territory. It is liable to lead to trouble and may encourage a resort to repudiation such as resulted from the division of Virginia. It is reported to be the views of the administration that Dakota should take no steps which may interfere with the division of the territory into three or four states eventually, in the interest of good government. Should the people go on and allow the legislature to involve their affairs so as to keep the territory in the present state, a great state as large as New England would result with but two senators, while New England has twelve.

Public Land Certificates.

Not long since Senator Harrison sent to the secretary of the interior a letter from Messrs. Graves & Vinton, of St. Paul, complaining of an order of the commissioner of the general land office, directing the register and receiver at Huron, Dak., not to issue certificates to the effect that no adverse claim of records is pending, the same to be used by the Indian agents who furnish money to settlers with which to pay the government price, or for other purposes. The secretary has written a letter to the senator in which he says:

I concur in your views as to the local land officers. They have no authority to execute or to charge for the certificates mentioned, and I believe the issuing of such certificates to be contrary to the spirit of the land laws inasmuch as they might be considered to create a right, or at least pass judgment upon the question, whether or not a right has been established under the law. It is one of those extra official acts which in my opinion should not be permitted. The public records, however of the various land offices are, or should be open to the inspection of anybody under proper regulations.

Good News for Smokers.

The impression has prevailed since the passage of the new internal revenue law that tobacco, snuff, cigar and cigarette manufacturers would not reduce prices after May 1 to the full extent of the reduction of the tax. To ascertain the views of leading manufactures on this subject a circular letter has been sent to each one of them asking for information on this point. The direct question is asked whether they have made or shall make any reduction in the prices of their goods in consequence of the reduction of the tax, and how much reduction they will make. So far about forty leading firms have responded. Quite a number evade a direct answer, while eighteen say they will make a reduction in their prices to the dealers. Of these sixteen say they will reduce to the extent of the reduction of the tax, that is, $3 per 1,000 on cigars $1.55 per 1,000 on cigarettes, and 8 cents per pound on manufactured tobacco and snuff. It is thought that a reduction by these various firms will force the others to reduce. This will be an interesting item to dealers. A proportionate reduction will no doubt follow in the prices of dealers to their customers, the consumers.

Artistic Official Swindling in Iowa.

The Iowa City Republican publishes an article exposing a scheme whereby the county is being swindled out of large sums of money by constables and other officers of the law. It says:

"The number of tramps that have been infesting this city for the last year has been so large that the police force has been increased. In the morning of each day these tramps were taken before a justice of the peace, and, being without money, they were allowed to go free on the promise that they would leave the town. The tramps then departed for the outskirts of the city, where they slept in barns and about evening returned to the city and were rearrested, jailed and let out on the following morning on the terms of the day before, only to repeat the performance, just giving themselves a good night's lodging, supper, and breakfast, the officers getting an average of $7 a day a piece for arresting and trying them. When it is known the county foots these bills, the reader can imagine how profitable it is to work the tramp business.

A DESERTED BRIDE.

Heartlessly Abandoned on Her Wedding Day, While Guests Await the Nuptials.

On Monday next, says the Cleveland, O., Leader, the doors of the State Lunatic Asylum will be open to admit a young lady whose intellect has been dethroned by the perfidy of a recreant bridegroom, a highly connected young man named D. Dullea, who basely fled on the morning of his wedding-day. The parties live at Harbor Creek, a country village about eight miles from Erie, and the name of the demented girl is Anna Peterson, the daughter of highly respectable residents of that place. Miss Peterson is nineteen years old, and, although not possessed of extraordinary beauty, she is far above the average girl in the sweetness of her disposition and amiable traits. About a year ago Mr. Dullee, a young man of considerable property, paid her marked attention, and in due time he gained her consent to wed him. The sunny dispositioned girl was happier and merrier than ever with the bright prospects before her and none so blithe and gay in the village as fair Anna Peterson. The 7th of February was set for the wedding day, and friends and relatives from far and near were invited to be present at the nuptial ceremony. In the preparations for the wedding none was more zealous, than the bridegroom, and to him were left many of the most important arrangements, all of which were executed with an apparent design to make the affair go off with as much eclat as possible. The morning came at last—a bright, cheerful day—and Anna Peterson bedecked herself in her gay bridal robes. The morning trains brought hosts of loving friends, who, as the hour drew nigh, assembled in the parlors, where the minister was in waiting to perform the ceremony. The bridesmaids were attired as elegantly as the young bride, and the parlors were profusely decorated with floral and other ornamental designs. The marriage was to be solemnized at noon, and at 11:50 the bride-groom had not arrived. No alarm was experienced, as it was known he had a couple of miles to drive, and some allowance was made for him out of consideration for the ordeal in store. A few minutes before a stranger rang the bell and handed in a letter addressed to the bride and in the well-known hand-writing of Mr. Dullea. The messenger hurried off, avoiding the questions put to him, and this aroused some misgiving that all was not well. The bride was upstairs waiting for her lover to lead her to the officiating clergyman, but her anxious parents were afraid to give her the letter. Fifteen minutes passed and then Miss Peterson began to wonder what kept Dullea. Not without forebodings of evil did her father present her with the letter. She took it hastily from his hand, tore it open, hurriedly glanced over its contents, and then with a heart-piercing shriek, dropped to the floor in a swoon. The fatal letter was picked up, and was read to the wedding guests. It was a curt, heartless epistle. It was as follows:

My Dear Miss Peterson: Circumstances over which I have no control compel me to forego the honor of wedding you to-day. This morning I was informed of a great necessity for my presence elsewhere. At some future time, if all goes well, I may see you, and then if our feelings for each other are unaltered our relations can be considered the same as though this little hitch in the arrangements had never happened. Yours truly, D. DULLEA.

P. S. Am going to travel.

Restoratives were applied and the deserted bride was restored. When she came out of her faint she astonished her friends by quietly readjusting her wreath of orange blossoms, and taking the hand of an aged neighbor, she addressed him by her false lover's name and announced herself ready to repeat the words that should make her his fond, living wife. Then it flashed upon the minds of all present that the shock had deprived her of all reason. They led her away like poor Ophelia, smiling and chatting in an artless, innocent way, that was heart-rending to witness. The house of rejoicing was changed to a house of sorrow. The guests departed, and Mr. and Mrs. Peterson were left alone with their demented child. During the night violent paroxysms attacked her, and these were succeeded by periods of insensibility. To add to the infamy of the affair the unhappy parents discovered that Duella had been a greater villain than even his base desertion proclaimed him to be. A secret that had been kept from her mother was disclosed by the mind-diseased daughter, and now it would not surprise the people of Harbor Creek if the minds of the parents sink under the weight of sorrow and shame that has fallen upon them.

Another Murder in Dakota.

A Mandan, Dak., Special of the 14th says Sheriff Harmon has just received a dispatch from Dickinson directing him to arrest George Mattox for the crime of murder. Inquiry developed the fact that Mattox, who has been hunting on the Buffalo range near Dickinson, shot and killed a man whose name has not yet been ascertained. Mattox was seen in Mandan yesterday, consulting a lawyer, ostensibly in the interest of a friend of his, who he claims was molested by another man in his camp, and after drawing a huge hunting knife on him twice; this leveled his gun at the intruder and fired, instantly killing the latter. It now appears that the friend is a myth and Mattox himself is the guilty party. The gun was one of extraordinary heavy calibre, carrying 120 grains of powder. Mattox is a man of family and will be arrested before morning as he is on his way east from Sully Springs.

Ex-Secretary Kirkwood Badly Injured.

Iowa City Special: Ex-Secretary Kirkwood of the Interior met with a severe accident this afternoon while riding out in his carriage with his daughter. The outside tugs come off, letting the pole drop. Both were thrown out, the secretary striking on his head and shoulders, receiving a severe concussion of the spine. He was unconcious at first, afterward revived, but showed slight paralytic symptoms. At 6 p. m. his physician left him resting quietly, with fair hope of recovery.

Muscle vs. Brains.

The largest crowd ever brought together by any exhibition of the kind in Boston attended the benefit last Monday night of John L. Sullivan in the Charitable Mechanics' fair building. Eighteen thousand people were present. The street in front of the main entrance to the building was densely packed and thousands were turned away. Order was easily preserved.

What Good Is It?

A "School Boy" writes to the Boston Herald the following letter. It is what more than one school boy and the parents of school boys are thinking: Going to school in the morning, one begins work with music, then arithmetic; after recess reading and spelling. In the afternoon one begins work with writing, then natural history and botany, then composition writing. Now, what good is music, natural history and botany to a boy who is going to be a mechanic? While learning to make a locomotive will botany teach him where the wheels will go, and where the smoke stack will stand? Will natural history learn a boy to keep books? Will it learn him to buy a package of silk? Then what is the use to teach it to the pupils of the free schools? What good does it do them?

I speak from experience, as I have gone to school for two years and know all about it.

The Herald makes the sterotyped reply that it will do him good some time or other, or somehow or other, but does not answer him very satisfactorily.

ANOTHER LONDON SENSATION.

Lady Florence Dixie Assaulted Near London by Two Armed Men Disguised as Women.

London Special: Lady Florence Dixie was attacked at Windsor by two men disguised in women's clothes. Her dress was cut with daggers in several places, but she received no injury. Lady Florence was walking in a secluded spot in the woods when the men asked her what time is was. She replied she had no watch and afterward noticed, although they wore women's clothes, their faces had been shaved. Much alarmed she started to walk away, and was followed by the men, one of whom seized her. She struggled to escape but seeing their daggers fell in a swoon. This occurred at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. She did not recover her senses until 4:45. Lady Florence has been prostrated. The story of the affair was elicited from her only at intervals. The saving of her life is attributed to her St. Bernard dog, which, it is supposed protected her while she lay in a swoon. Lady Florence did not suspect danger immediately, although she has been somewhat fearful since the receipt of a letter about the land leaguers. The last thing she remembered is one man pushing a quantity of mud in her mouth. On her recovery she found both palms cut across and her gloves severed. There were two dagger holes, two inches apart, in the right breast of her dress. A broad steel corset rib was broken by the weapon, which had penetrated the inner lining of her dress at the first stroke and her corset at the second stroke. Lady Florence supposes she unconsciously struggled with the men, assisted by her dog, until the scoundrels were disturbed by a cart passing the woods. She received threatening letters when in Ireland recently. One of them wore a green dress and a large hat with a veil. The veiled man attempted the assassination. No arrests have been made. The police have a slight clue to the scoundrels. It is believed the men were bitten in the struggle. Lady Dixie says her head is confused and painful. She supposes the miscreants stunned her. In Irish affairs she has long taken an active part, expressing her sympathy publicly with Mr. Gray at the time of the incarceration, devoting herself with characteristic impetuosity to relieve distress in the suffering districts of the west, and finally falling foul of the land league in a pamphlet called 'An address to tenant farmers and people of Ireland with an advice and warning, in which she urged them to call upon the financial administrators of the league for a statement of the manner in which the funds had been expended. The retort of the land league took the shape of a paragraph in the Irishman asking Lady Florence if she had ever been expelled from the court of Queen Victoria, and if so, for what cause. Her letter in reply was refused insertion by the Irishman, but the Freeman's Journal published her statement of the case.

New York, March 19.—The Herald correspondent had an interview with Lady Florence Dixie at her charming little residence, "The Fisheries," on the bank of the Thames, near Windsor, where she is staying with her husband, Sir Beaumount Dixie, and her brother, Lord James Douglas. Your correspondent found Lady Florence in the road surrounded by gentlemen, with whom she was conversing. Her ladyship was dressed in a cardinal Jersey; her dress, animated appearance and manner, showing no traces of the severe and terrible ordeal which she had gone through with not twenty-four hours before. Lady Florence gave your correspondent the following account with the utmost frankness:

I returned from Ireland six weeks ago, and came here for the purpose of retirement and quiet, as I have a great deal of work to do, though at this period of the year I invariably stay at our seat in Leicestershire. On Saturday afternoon at a quarter to 5 I sauntered into the plantation which adjoins "The Fisheries" with my St. Bernard dog, and had reached the gate opening into the Windsor road, when my attention was first called to a soldier and a woman passing by. While looking after them and mentally remarking the fine physique of the man; I was addressed by what appeared to be two tall women, dressed in long cloaks of dark stuff and wearing veils, who asked me o tell them the time. I replied that I had no watch upon me and turned back again into the plantation. I was about crossing the stile when I noticed that the women had followed me; this roused my suspicion, as the ground was private, so I faced around to meet them. I had scarcely done so when one seized me by the throat and struck me violently on the head, and threw me on the ground. I called loudly for help, when they pushed clay into my mouth. I then saw by their clean shaved chins that they were men in the disguise of women's apparel. While prostrate I saw the other man raise a knife and aim a savage blow at my right breast. The knife struck the steel ribs of my corset, and glanced off. Without uttering a word he again made a stab, which I caught in my left hand. I remember seeing him raise his hand to strike another blow, which I received in my right hand. I also remember hearing the noise of a cart in the road and seeing my dog fly at the men; then I swooned. I came to my senses in half an hour afterward and I found myself lying in the same spot where I fell. I got up and walked back to the house and told my husband and brother of the terrible outrage. They departed for Windsor to lay the account before the authorities.

Your correspondent questioned Lady Dixie as to the motive of the crime. She said:

The whole affair is most mysterious. I can ascribe a motive to no one, as my sympathies for the Irish people have been openly avowed, and well known.

It was assumed that the attack would be laid at the door of the Irish, an assumption which she warmly repudiated, adding, "In these days every crime must be of Irish origin.

Mistakes in Planting.

A writer in the Rural Home tells of several mistakes he has made. One was in cutting potatoes and allowing the pieces to remain in a barrel, where in a few days they heated so as to spoil half of them. Again he made a mistake in planting corn with hen-manure beneath it, for when the young roots started they were burned and the corn was sick throughout the season. We may avoid such mistakes in the future. He then speaks of another class of mistakes: "If we plant a certain portion of our land with potatoes and another portion with beans, and from some natural cause (drought, perhaps,) the potatoes turn out poorly, and the beans do well and sell for high prices, we say we have made a mistake in not planting all our land with beans. Another year we attempt to remedy the mistake, and plant a large quantity of beans and a small quantity of potatoes; this time perhaps a very wet season, the beans 'go back' on us and the potatoes yield a good crop. We still have to enter on our record a mistake in not planting more potatoes and less beans; mistakes of the first class when once discovered can always be avoided but mistakes of the second class are apt to 'go, the best' even of the best of our farmers, and such mistakes will continue to occurr until we can foretell for a certainty just what kind of a season we are going to have and just the price our various farm products will bring."

The secret inquiry at Dublin Castle to hear the evidence of the informers continues daily. It is openly charged that the various informers are being carefully couched in their testimony.

"A Darter av My Own."

According to the Hour, Sam Kimper was a ferryman on a western river, who although much addicted to drinking, was a good, straight-forward fellow, always courteous and correct in his dealings. One night as he was "poling" a man and a woman in a buggy across the river he heard her say. "What will my father think?" Further talk ensued during which he recognized the voice of a doctor's daughter living a few miles down stream. He did not like the man's voice and was confirmed in his prejudice when the fellow began talking about going to Cincinnati and not letting her father know of their movements for a week. The girl began crying and the fellow answered roughly. She begged him to take her back home. "Take you pack home," said he in a rough laugh. "Let a bird out of a cage after you have fairly caught it? Oh' no! I love you too well for that." By this time the boat was nearly across the river, and Sam said to the stranger, "Mister, the current's pooty swift to-day; there's a right smart freshet on. Reckon I'll have to ask you to make the lines fast ashore while I hold the boat agin the bank. The man got out and stood at the bow of the boat. Sam poled it against the bank with such violence that over went the man on to the shore. Sam let the boat drift away and turning to the girl, amidst the howls and curses of the man in the water, said: "Reckon ye don't want him no more, do ye?" "No, no!" see exclaimed. The girl being in doubt about her ability to drive her home, even after she had reached the other shore' Sam let his boat go down the stream. "What are you going to do?" asked the girl. "Boat ye down to the steamboat landin' fur your town." "That will be a dreadful lot of work all for a silly girl." "I've got a darter of my own," said he. Pretty soon he stopped poling' and the gial said he must be very tired. "Not a bit of it," said Sam." "I'm alowin' up so's to reach there about dusk." "Just what I wanted to ask you to do," said the girl. "Thought sof "I've got a darter uv my own." Everything was favorable, and no one saw the carriage drive off the boat. The girl promised that her father should pay Sam hanhsomely. "I don't want his money," said Sam "I've got a darter of my own. There's one thing I do want," said Sam; "if doctors don't know good stuff from bad, nobody does, and if he could send me a good so id drink o' somethin', seein' 'twill take me two or three hours to pole the boat back." The promise was readily given, and in a few minutes down came the doctor with a battle of brandy and two men to pole the boat back; but Sam said the brandy brandy would be more useful as well as better company. The doctor wanted to know how he could repay him and Sam answered, "You can repay me in kind, ef ye ever get a chance. I've got a darter uv my own, ye know."

Corn, weak and neglected; No. 2, 56c; no sales. Oats, firmer; No. 2, 40½c; white, 43½@45c. Rye, entirely nominal; 58c bid for No. 1; 55c for No. 2. Barley, very quiet and a shade lower; extra No. 3, 51½c. Provisions firm. Mess pork, $18.30 cash and March; $18.65 May. Lard, prime steam, $11.25 cash and March; $11.50 May. Butter, dull; fancy creameries, 26@30c. Cheese, scarce and firm. Eggs, firmer. Receipts—Flour, 8,267 bbls; wheat, 21,975 bu; barley, 8,795 bu. Shipments—Flour, 12,890 bbls; wheat, 1,000 bu; barley, 8,800 bu.

ST. PAUL.

FLOUR—Quotations: Patents, Orange Blossom, $7; Red Cross straights, $6.25; "Capitol" family, $5.75; XXXX, $4.50@5.50; in bbls 25c extra; on side brands, 25@50c per bbl less, according to quality. Buckwheat flour, $6@6.50 per bbl. Rye flour, $4.50 per bbl. Graham, $5 per bbl.

WHEAT—The market was firmly held, and movements were light. What is on hand is mostly controlled by operators holding for better prices. The millers are standing off for lower values, and thus there is but little doing. In the morning Chicago advanced, but later eased off. Receipts here are light. The market closed quiet; No. 1 hard, $1.10 bid; April, $1.11 bid; May, $1.15 bid; No. 1, $1.05; No. 2 hard, $1.05; No. 2, $1; all bids.

CORN—The market was quiet. Quotations were stronger in asking, owing to light stocks, though the demand was light. No. 2, 52c; April, 53c; May, 56c; new mixed, 49c, all asking.

OATS—Spot trading was light, but in May delivery, No. 2 mixed, there was good speculative activity. Quotations unchanged. Year deliveries were called yesterday for the first time this season. No. 2 mixed, 38½c bid, 39½c asked; April, 39c bid; May, 41c bid, 43c asked; year, 32c bid, 31c asked; No. 3 mixed, 37c bid; No. 2 white, 40c bid, 40½c asked. Sales: 1 car No. 2 white, 40½c; 20,000 bu No. 2 mixed, p. t.

BARLEY—Market overstocked and prices weak under slow demand, though remaining unchanged in quotations. No. 2, 68c; extra No. 3, 55c; No. 3, 45c.

RYE—No. 2, 53c bid.

MILLSTUFFS—Ground feed steady at $19 asked. Coarse corn meal, $18 buying, $19 asked; bolted do, $25@26 per ton. Incoming; outgoing, $1.50@1.65 per 100 lbs, sacked. Bran, sacked, $13 asked. Linseed meal, car lots, $20 per ton; jobbing, $21. Sales: 2 cars ground feed, 19.

SEEDS—Timothy, $1.50 bid. Clover, $7.20 bid. Flax seed steady; general range, $1.15@1.18 for No. 1, on the basis of pure, with bulk of transactions at the former. Sale: 1 car, choice, at $1.18.

BALED HAY—Market quiet, on light demand. Wild, $7 asked; timothy, $10@10.50. Receipts of wild fairly liberal; timothy scarce.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—This staple shows but little daily alteration in prices, but there is a growing feeling of more firmness. A large number of mills are now idle, and the quantity of flour in the various markets is very perceptibly diminishing, causing a better outlook for the future. Local quotations: Patents, $6.50@7 per bbl; straights, $5.50@6.50; clears, $5.25@5.70 per bbl. Low grades are in fair request at $2@3.25 per bbl.

MILLSTUFFS—While this product in various descriptions was hardly so strong as last week, the actual selling price was but little altered. Bran sold at $11@11.25 in bulk, $12.50@12.75 in sacks. Shorts rather weak and offered at $11.75@12 per ton. Coarse corn meal $18@19 per ton in car lots on track; $18.50@19.50 f. o. b. Mixed feed was in moderate request at 50c@$1 per ton above coarse corn meal.

WHEAT—There was a demand for No. 1 hard wheat at $1.11, and the market closed with sellers at $1.11½. May was offered at $1.16, $1.15 bid; No. 2 hard was quoted at $1.07½; No. 1 Northern was offered at $1.07½; $1.02 was bid for No. 2 Northern; sample lots, without naming grade, sold at 65@$1.01. The tone of prices at the close was weak and the trading slow.

CORN—51c was bid for No. 2 spot; 53½c was bid for May, with sellers at 54; trading light.

OATS—Were not offered freely. Prices were the same nominally as on Saturday; 39½c for No. 2; 41@42c for choice white, and 38c for rejected by grade, and 35@39c by sample.

RYE—53c bid for No. 2.

BARLEY—Nominal; 45c bid for No. 3.

HAY—Quiet at $7.50@8.25 for wild.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

Uniform of Minnesota Militia.

The committee appointed to select a uniform for the state militia companies have decided upon the following, which has been submitted to the governor for his approval: The service uniform for the artillery company is a dark blue, close fitting blouse, with pants of the same color with scarlet facings and United States regulation helmets with scarlet cords and plumes. The dress uniform will remain unchanged. The infantry companies will be attired in dark blue blouses, trimmed with light blue facings, or the tunic now worn by Company D, this portion of the uniform being optional with the different companies. Pants of light blue color with black stripe and United States regulation helmet.

John M. Funderhide of Pleasant Valley dropped dead in the road while returning from the timber on the 9th inst.

The sash and door factory belonging to Chase, Pillsbury & Co., Gull River, was burned. Loss, $15,000.

Frank Lombard has erected a mill on Clearwater river about twelve miles above Red Lake falls, and intends to put up a grist mill this summer.

The Blue Earth City Post says the Topsy of a traveling Uncle Tom's Cabin company, stole $25 worth of underclothing from a boarding house. An officer followed the company to Lake Crystal, where the stolen articles were found in her possession. She confessed her guilt and was bounced by the managers of the company.

Mr. Rudolph Androwski, one of the old settlers of Mankato, died at his home in the northern part of the city on Wednesday last.

An Indian boy was siteing on the brak beam of a box car standing on the north switch opposite the passenger depot at Detroit, when the car was bumped by a backing train, throwing the boy in such a position that the wheels passed diagonally across his body from the top of the shoulder to the thigh, crushing the head and body into an unrecognizable mass.

Prof. D. L. Kiehle, the state superintendent of public instruction, has prepared a very perfect synopsis of the duties of the state and county officers, agents, contractors and the trade, in respect to the distribution and sale of books under the amendment to the state text book law adopted by the legislature at its late session. He has issued a circular to the county officers and school district officers responsible for and interested in the execution of this law as amended and a synopsis of their duties thereunder.

James J. Hill, president of the Manitoba railroad, has given $5,000 to the State Historical society towards a new building.

The attention of the attorneys is called to the fact that the supreme court, April term, will convene at the capitol April 3, 1883, at 12 m. The calendar will be closed and placed in the hands of the printer March 31, and all returns on appeals must be on file at that date. Stipulation of attorneys will not place cause on calendar, and note of issue must be filed. The court rules require seven copies of paper books and briefs furnished in each case.

Herman Gunz, one of the engrossing clerks in the senate during the late legislature, has been appointed postal route agent between La Cresse and Chicago. He takes E. P. Vanvalkenburgh's place.

Charles Pollar, living near Le Roy, died recently from an over dose of laudanum, taken to secure sleep.

Mrs. Henry Castle, wife of Register deeds and clerk of court castle, of Sherburne county, died in Elk River on Saturday last.

The family of Edward Siebel, of Germantown, were taken quite ill two weeks since and Dr. Aubin was called; upon examination they were found to have trichinosis disease caused by eating diseased pork. Mr. Siebel is still very low, but his chances are good for recovery.

James Bruce White died at his home Delano, aged fifty-four years.

Seever Peterson, an old resident of Hastings, was run over by a team, dying soon after.

Mr. Handy Britt, an old resident of Janesville, died very suddenly Sunday night last. Up to within a few moments of his death he was apparently in usual health.

What the Funny Men Say.

A comic coon: A very colored man, who entered complaint against another for assaulting and battering him upon the head, was told by the justice: "I don't see any marks." "Does ye s'pose he hit me wid a piece of chalk!" was the indignant rejoinder. The case proceeded.—Boston Herald.

Explaining the tracks: Mistress (who has long suspected her servant of having a follower and thinks she has caught her at last)—"Mary, your master wishes to know the meaning of these large footmarks; can you explain?" Mary—"Oh, yes, mum! my sister's been here and she's got the gout so bad she has to wear big boots."—London Judy.

New reading of an old adage: The old proverb, "Where there's a will there's a way," has been revised to suit the situation. It now reads: "When there's a bill we're away."—Wheeling Journal.

Cui bono: "Then you think," said Wittiboi to the insurance examiner, "that I am a good risk?" "Yes, sir," replied the doctor, "a first-class one." "Then, what in thunder do I want to get insured for?" said Wittiboi. "Much obliged for your examination."

The course of true love: Bertha and Gontran adore each other, but their stern parents are inexorably opposed to the union of the young people. The young people consequently are in despair. "There is only one thing left to us," says Bertha, pale, but resolute. "And that is—?" "Death!" "Death! But, dearest, suicide is a crime under the new code." "I know it is, but I have thought of a plan to get round that. First you must kill me—" "Kill you, my darling!" "And then I will kill you!"—French Fun.

Specimen recipe: A novel in the style of Mr. William Black—Take one yacht, the Hebrides, an obstinate young lady and one piper. Add to these a Highland laird and colonsay; now introduce a young man in a kilt and Oronsay, with a pinch of the Kyles of Bute and Ben Muich Dahl. Flavor to suit taste with Garlic, border ballad and Stornaway; cover with pathos and serve.—The Century.

The grease: When he had called the meeting to order Brother Gardner arose and said: "Gen'len, if it wasn't for de wheels on a wagon he wagon wouldn't move. When de wheels is on, den what?" "Grease!" solemnly exclaimed an old man. "Kerrect!" whispered the president, softly rubbing his hands together. "We hez de wagon an' de wheels. We will now pass de hat aroun' for de grease."—Detroit Free Press.

Salvation's free: At a recent Salvation Army meeting at Poole, in Dorsetshire, it was announced that a "tea meeting" would be held on the following week. A printed circular gave the day and the hour of the meeting, and concluded: "Salvation is free, but not the tea."—Christian at Work.

Now is the time to invest in Crookston real estate and in Polk County soil. Lots can now be bought at prices that will double in less than six months even if no further improvements are secured than are already commenced. A dollar invested in city lots to-day is sure to give a good account of itself before fall and yield a return of at least two, and he who invests now will bless himself for having caught on in time, for no sooner than our new mills are up than others will follow until our magnificent water power will be utilized to its fullest capacity. As to our farming lands they are now cheaper than they will ever be again. Every year the area of government and cheap railroad lands is being lessened until the time is not far hence when it will be gone or so remote as to be undesirable. To-day, good farming lands may be had at figures that in a short time will look ridiculously small and will pay 100 per cent upon the investment. If you are going to invest don't wait but catch on while a chance to make a handsome profit remains.

A meeting of the Agricultural Society was held at the city hall on Thursday evening last. It was resolved to dissolve the society after its affairs shall be duly settled and to form a joint stock company. W. H. Jennings was made president of the meeting for consideration of the new project and W D. Hurlbut secretary. Capt. Brown moved the formation of a stock company for fair purposes, which motion prevailed. K. D. Chase moved the appointment of a committee of three to frame articles of incorporation which motion prevailed and W. D. Hurlbut, D. Jacobus and M. R. Brown were appointed such committee, I Fortier, A. McKinnon and E. M. Walsh were appointed a committee to solicit subscriptions. The object is to scatter the subscriptions throughout the county, to that end no one will be allowed to own more than one share of $25. The society adjourned until Thursday evening, March 22d. During the week the subscription committee have raised almost enough to purchase 20 acres of ground of Chris. Sathre and have bought the land and will now endeavor to raise enough to make the payment in full and also enough to build fences and suitable buildings. The land secured is eligible for the purpose and is a bargain at the price paid—$30 per acre. Prospects for a good, solid Agricultural Society are brilliant.

We notice that several of our contemporaries have stated that Fairfax has voted $5,000 for ditching and road purposes. The wish is evidently father to the thought for the announcement is altogether too previous. No election has been called as yet but the supervisors have talked the matter over and have decided to call a special election when the proposition to bond the town in the sum of $5,000 for road purposes will be voted on and we sincerely trust that the statements that have been made will prove true. If every farmer in Fairfax could be made to feel the importance of the measure we have no doubt the bonds would carry by a large majority. We have estimated the cost to every farmer and find that it would amount to about $2 per annum and when we consider the immense benefit to every farmer of good roads, and not only so but also from the ditches that would be made along side the roads we think it decidedly a paying investment. With good roads and ditches every acre of land in Fairfax would by worth from $5 to $10 more per acre than it is to-day. With good roads the farmer could haul his grain to market at least one-half cheaper than now and in fact the advantages he would enjoy would be too many to enumerate in one short newspaper article. The election will be called at an early day, we are told, and we hope that not one vote will be cast against so wise a measure. There will not if each one understands the importance of the measure. Vote the bonds and see that the money is judiciously expended and not many years will elapse before every acre in Fairfax will be under cultivation.

Aldal Reports.

As usual the election here at Aldal was a lively, as well as a mixed up affair: eighty-three votes were polled. The local strife between Aldal and Fertile was bought forward now, as before, and the Fertile people appeared on the field with an independent ticket which, except one candidate for constable, was defeated. License was defeated by a majority of seven. The following is the ticket elected: Supervisors—Iver Ingebrightson, chairman; E. K. Overland, Albert Haure. Assessor—K. Bolstad. Treasurer—K. Opheim. Justices—A. Gilmour, Dr. A. Nelson. Town Clerk—Ole L. Hanery. Constables—A. Opheim, E. T. Johnson. All, except the last mentioned, were nominated on the straight ticket. It was moved and seconded that the next election be held in K. Nelson's hall, at Aldal, but an amendment was promptly put to have it at the (future) schoolhouse at Fertile. Now, according to parliamentary rules, this was clearly a new motion and not an amendment, but after some talk and several votes being taken, it was finally decided that the next election be held at Aldal, in Nelson's hall. The late board had recommended that the sum of $500 be voted for roads and bridges, which was not adopted.

At a late meeting of members (and non-members) of "The Little Norway" Evangelical Lutheran congregation of this township, it was resolved to move their unfinished church building from the south side of the river to the north side, which has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction among many of said members. We also understand that the bodies in the old grave yard are to be removed to the new place. Our opinion is that the dead and buried had better remain where they are.

Mr. Askel O. Mervig is happy over the advent of a little innocent, a girl. Mother and child doing well.

The heavy timbers for the foundation of the county bridge at Aldal are on the site, and we understand that work on it will soon begin.

Mr. K. Nelson is now stocking up heavy for the spring trade, and proposes to supply the wants of his customers in the general merchandise line, flood or no flood.

Ole O. Christianson, lately a clerk in K. Nelson's store here, has accepted a similar position in a store at Ada.

The river at this place is so full of springs that the ice has mostly disappeared.

The scarlet fever has not yet disappeared, though no severe cases have been reported to Dr. A. Nelson lately. The doctor, by the way, is having a large practice now and has lately performed some very difficult operations successfully, notably so on a gentleman for a deep abscess on the upper left [illegible] requiring great skill and a strong nerve.

Quite a number of immigrants from the old country as well as from the older settlements in this country are expected here this spring.

Sleighing is already spoiled over here in the valley.

COUNCIL PROCEEDINGS.

COUNCIL CHAMBERS,
Crookston, March 19th, 1883.

Council met at the usual hour with all its members present. A. M. Stewart was appointed judge of election in place of K. D. Chase. R. B. Gates was appointed judge of election in the 4th ward in place of D. Jacobus, and the voting precinct charged from the Red River House to the office of Brower & McLean. The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the City of Crookston issue bonds to the amount of $16,000, in accordance with an act of the Legislature, approved Feb. 20th, 1883; said bonds to be of the denomination of $1,000 each, to run twenty-five years and to draw an interest annually at the rate of seven per cent.

The Recorder was instructed to issue the blank bonds.

Resolved, That the City of Crookston sell to M. R. Brown that part of the se¼ of nw¼ of Sec. 25, T. 150. R. 47, which lies north of slough; said tract to be measured from the center of said slough, for the sum of $25 per acre.

Resolved, That the Mayor and Recorder are hereby authorized to execute a warranty deed on the part of the City of Crookston to the said M. R. Brown.

A petition was presented from property holders on Pine street, asking for vacating a portion of lots 1, 2 and 3, block 5, in Davis' addition. Also to grade said street from 6th to Grant street, and lay sidewalks. Referred to Stuart and Nolan. An application from owners of steam flouring mill for abatement of street tax was referred to Fortier and Morris. An application from same parties for the surplus water power belonging to the city was referred to Stuart and Nolan. A bond for deed for water power and appurtenances, from D. D. Chase to the city, was read and referred to J. G. McGrew for his opinion as to its legality. Bill of K. D. Chase for $635 was referred to Nolan and Morris. A committee of two was appointed to inquire into the expediency of putting in a telephone at the engine house. Bills to the amount of $83.84 were allowed. Adjourned till Monday evening, March 26th, 1883.

W. D. HURLBUT, Recorder.

C. H. MIX. Agent.

Detroit Record: Mr. L. S. Cravath representing the Northern Pacific Elevator Company, was in the city yesterday and made us a pleasant call. Mr. Cravath has a fine dairy and stock farm north of Audubon, and already has a fine herd of horned stock, numbering sixty-five head. Other farmers of this county should follow the example of Mr. C. Just so long as one single article of produce is the main dependence of the farming community just so long will genuine prosperity and permanent development be deterred. Mixed farming and stock raising is the true source of wealth and substantial growth to a farming community, and we hope for its early prevalence in this county.

High Price of Stock.

Minnesota Tribune.

Instead of becoming cheaper, stock of all kind—horses, cows, steers, sheep and hogs, are creeping up to higher prices, and it looks now as if the prices will continue to increase for at least the next six months. Stall fed beef is in demand, and we doubt if the supply will be sufficient for the demand until good grass fed beef is in the market.

We do hope the farmers of the Northwest will not do what they did last—and that was to sell off to cattle dealers all of their surplus young stock. It is true the prices they received was a great temptation for them to part with their yearlings and two-year-old steers and heifers, but the prices last fall were much higher in proportion than they were last spring, and then the loss in the growth was very considerable. Farmers are well aware that it costs but a mere pittance to pasture stock during the late spring and all of the summer and fall months, especially in the valley of the Mississippi. The profit derived from the growth during this time is a matter of a good deal of moment. By good right this profit belongs to the farmers. It almost always happens that the fall of the year is the best time to sell the surplus stock from the farm. Stall fed beef and working oxen are exceptions, but then it is seldom that the latter is found in farmers' hands these days in the West, as they have mostly disappeared, horses having taken the place of oxen as beasts of burden.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from active practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India Missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for General Debility and all nervous complaint, after having thoroughly tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, feels it is his duty to make it known to his fellows. The recipe, with full particulars, directions for preparation and use, and all necessary advice and instructions for successful treatment at your own home will be sent you by return mail, free of charge, by addressed envelope.

Mortgage Sale.

Notice is hereby given that a mortgage made by Andrew Kelley, (a single man) mortgagor, to Ole Rear, mortgagee, dated August 8th, 1882, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Polk County, Minnesota, on the 8th day of August, A. D. 1882, at forty-five minutes after eleven o'clock in the forenoon, in book "H" of mortgages, on page 189, will be foreclosed by sale of the mortgaged premises hereinafter described, for default in the payment of the sum of three hundred thirteen and 33-100 dollars, which is claimed to be due, and is due thereon at the date of this notice. The said mortgaged premises so to be sold are the west half of the northeast quarter and the east one-half of the northwest quarter of Section number thirty-two (32) in Township one hundred and forty-nine (149) north, of Range forty-six (46) west, situate in said Polk County, and containing one hundred and sixty acres of land according to government survey. Said sale will be made on Saturday, the 31st day of March, A. D. 1883, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, at the front door of the Court House in Crookston, in said county, to satisfy the amount due on said mortgage, and twenty-five dollars attorney fees as stipulated in said mortgage, and the disbursements allowed by law.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of one hundred and ninety six 72 100 dollars, which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Thomas Lambert and Josephine Lambert, his wife, to Carl Kretzschmar, bearing date the 26th day of November, A. D. 1881, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 29th day of November, A. D. 1881, at 1:10 o'clock p. m., in book "B" of Mortgages, on page 553, to secure the payment of one certain promissory note, dated Nov. 26th, 1881, made by said Thomas Lambert and Josephine Lambert, whereby they promised to pay to the order of Carl Kretzschmar the sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars with interest at ten per cent. per annum until paid, payable one year after date, and no action or proceeding at law or otherwise having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: The northwest quarter (¼) of Section number twenty-four (24) in Township number one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-six (46), in Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, will be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises and twenty-five dollars attorney's fee, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House in the City of Crookston in said County and State, on the thirteenth day of April, A. D. 1883, at ten o'clock a. m. of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated February 27th, A. D. 1883.

A MOST ASTONISHING OFFER!

Read what $1 will do,

On receipt of $1.00 we will send CITY AND COUNTRY one year to any address in the United States or Canadas, and in addition will give each subscriber 20 Choice Books, each book containing a COMPLETE story or first class novel by a celebrated American or European author, handsomely illustrated and bound in pamphlet form, and send them free of postage. These books bound in cloth, and bought separately at the book store would cost at least $1.00 each.

For $1.25 City and Country and Thirty Books.

MONTHLY PRIZES.—Feb'y.—To first Ten giving middle verse of the Bible, correctly, a two year's subscription to CITY AND COUNTRY and 10 books. March.—To first Ten stating correctly, number of times word "Reverend" occurs in Bible and where, CITY AND COUNTRY one year and a Self-Adjusting Watch Key. April.—To the one giving the largest list of words ending in "ance," CITY AND COUNTRY one year and 30 books. Competitors for these prizes must enclose ten cents for each prize. Prizes announced in March, April, and May issues, and copies sent to competitors.

The above are the most astounding offers of the century. The already very extended circulation of CITY AND COUNTRY and the great demand for these works enable us to make this unparalleled offer. CITY AND COUNTRY is a 24-page, Illustrated, Literary and Agricultural monthly which is destined to have an enormous circulation and tremendous influence, and is already a recognized leader. Any one sending in the money who can HONESTLY say they are not perfectly satisfied with the books can have their money promptly refunded. We guarantee entire satisfaction. Money by Post-Office order or registered letter may be sent at our risk.

Our Grand Premium Offer,

For 150 Subscribers to CITY AND COUNTRY at $1.00 per year we will present the sender of the club with a handsome Combination Spring Buggy, (no top.) We will also pay the freight, so that the club raiser will have nothing to pay out of his own pocket.

COMBINATION BUGGY GEAR.
WITH LONGITUDINAL SPRING.

The Combination Buggy, (cash price at factory, $100,) of which the above cut represents the Gear, has become known as the very best for easy riding and durable qualities. Years of most trying use, in private and in livery, has abundantly proved this fact. These buggies are in every respect first class, being manufactured by the world renowned COLUMBUS BUGGY COMPANY, of Columbus, Ohio, Kansas City, Mo., and Indianapolis, Ind., whose work is everywhere acknowledged by those who are acquainted with it as strictly first class.

Before attempting to earn this Bonanza Premium we expect you to write to the COLUMBUS BUGGY COMPANY, Columbus, O., who will forward full description of this buggy accompanied with hundreds of testimonials. Space here will allow us to only describe the peculiar merit of the longitudinal central spring, marked "A" on cut. This prevents the torsional strain on the end springs which causes them to become loose, and rattle, and frequently break, besides it adds to the elasticity of the springs producing easy riding qualities. Only first class material is used—steel tires and axles, trimmings of never fading cloth or fancy leather.

County News.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

No. 1 hard quoted at 91 cents; oats, 50 cents; corn, firm at $1.

Jacob Gahr is putting up a large ice house south of the track.

Joseph Friedsam has hired a car to ship saw dust from Fisher for his ice house.

N. A. Van Meter, of Grandon, has purchased lots here and intends to put up a building for the handling of flour, feed and lumber.

A double force of men has been put to work on the ice break of the railroad bridge so as to have it finished before the ice breaks up.

The School Board is to put an architect to work drawing up the plans and specifications for the school house, and when finished will be ready for bids.

Everybody is well satisfied with the appointment of Dennis Dwyer as deputy sheriff, and is confident that the law will be enforced in the future.

A gentleman from New York State is expected to arrive shortly, and if he is pleased with the outlook, will commence the erection of a large number of dwellings for rental purposes.

Things are beginning to look like business again. The people have thrown away their buffalo overcoats, and are to be seen hard at work in their shirt sleeves. The boom has commenced.

The bridge across the Morias three miles east of here, has been completed. It is well put up and strong and the only objection is that it is too low, and it is feared the ice will take it out in the spring.

Fred Straei, who has been visiting relatives and friends in Norway for the past four months, returned to East Grand Forks, bringing a lady and gentleman acquaintance along. The party is stopping at the residence of Gullikson, on Field Avenue.

The much talked of prize fight that was to have taken place on this side of the river was a fizzle, one of the men failing to put in an appearance. It is well it failed, for the people of East Grand Forks made up their minds to prevent it, and Justice Patterson and the constable were busy appointing deputies, and by the time appointed were on the ground in force. You will have to go elsewhere to fight, boys.

Tuesday last Sheriff Zwickey, of Crookston, came up and in conformance with the wish of the people installed Dennis Dwyer as Deputy Sheriff of Polk County. The business necessary to the appointment had hardly been completed when the Judges of Election declared him the choice of the people for constable of the town of East Grand Forks, and thus Mr. Dwyer found himself elected to two important offices in the space of a few hours. Later in the evening at the meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, after the regular business of the meeting had been transacted, he was presented with an elegant silver star by several of his admirers. Mr. Wilkinson presenting the token in a neat little speech.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

From the Spectator.

Mr. George Copeland, is among the gentlemen contemplating building in the near future.

Dan Patterson met with a severe loss on Sunday last by the death of one of his sorrel horses. The animal was valued at $200.

We are informed by his agent, Mr. Thos. Sanvick, that Judge Ives intends erecting here shortly a store building 24x60, and two stories high. It will be for rent.

N. O. Hendricks, who for the past few months has been in the employ of Fontaine & Anglim, of Crookston, having heard of the fame of the New Chicago, came up here on Friday last to look us [illegible] visited us within the past few months, he was delighted with the present appearance and future prospects of our rising young town, and said that if the parties who were interested with him were agreeable, he would soon be on record as one of our merchants. If Mr. Hendricks does come here we will venture the assertion that he will never regret it, for in the whole Red River Valley no better opening could be found for an energetic young business man of his calibre.

Mr. David Hattlestad, of the firm of Ives & Hattlestad of Crookston, passed a few days this week on his farm near St. Hilaire. It is supposed that the visit of Mr. H. was not passed in idleness but will prove of great value to the Young Chicago.

Carman Carvings.

Carman Courier.

Mr. Ira Gallagher has assumed the duties of clerk in the store of E. D. Childs & Co., until the first of next month.

Mr. Daoust was the first of our citizens to relieve the monotonous sound of sleigh bells by placing a wagon on the road Saturday.

Mr. A. Dreeland, our enterprising section foreman, has cleared the snow and ice from off the depot platform at this station, and should receive the thanks of our citizens in consequence.

Mr. C. H. McLaren and son William, father and brother to our esteemed townsman, Jack B. McLaren, arrived Tuesday for a short visit. The father returned to his home near Larimore, Dakota, yesterday.

Our public schools will close the spring term on the 30th of March, one week from to-morrow. This department has been under the careful management of Mr. S. J. Kimball, who has rendered satisfaction to all parties concerned.

Work on the railroad from Detroit to Red Lake Falls, which has been projected for a long time, will be commenced as soon as spring opens. A corps of surveyors will be sent out as soon as the snow leaves the ground to locate the line.

By an oversight no mention was made of the return of Archie McCleary last week from the pineries of Wisconsin, where he has spent the greater part of the winter. He has returned to resume his customary duties, that of foreman on Mr. Child's farm.

Since our last issue Carman has lost two of its best citizens in the persons of Mr. G. M. Bell and son, Earnest T., who have departed for their home in Garry, Dakota. For the past year these gentlemen have been in charge of the store of Mr. E. D. Childs & Co., the former as manager and the latter as book-keeper, and filled their respective positions with credit to themselves and entire satisfaction to their employers. Their many friends in this section are sorry to loose such good citizens as the Messrs. Bell have proven themselves to be, and wish them success in their present home.

On Saturday evening three or four sleigh loads of our citizens drove some three and a half miles from here to the residence of Mr. C. B. Bruce and succeeded in taking the family entirely by surprise. Although not aware of their coming, the guests were well entertained by Mr. Bruce and his estimable lady until the "wee sma' hours," when they depaated for their homes feeling that 'twas good to be there.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Red Lake Falls has been full of eastern capitalists the past week.

The logs at O. Buse's saw mill are accumulating very fast.

Mr. McClatchie, is doing some very effectual work at deep well boring.

The three ice breakers in front of the Clearwater bridge are completed.

Leading Feather, one of the chiefs from the Red Lake Reservation was in town last week.

Our merchants are all improving the fast departing snow, hauling in their spring supplies.

Mr. Kaufer has closed the Headquarters hotel with a view to engage in another line of business.

The road between this place and Red Lake is nearly completed, there being only about twelve miles left to cut through.

Shall we have a daily mail until we get our railroad? That is the question that is agitating the minds of our people just now.

Miles & Abraham have located here permanently and will soon commence the erection of an office to do their real estate business in.

A petition has been circulated among our business men this week to raise funds to help the Indians complete the road between this place and Red Lake.

The number of strangers in our lively "little village" is constantly increasing. Most of them invest in village property, and all who come say that others of their friends will soon follow them.

Mr. F. Buse returned Friday from an extended trip to the east. Mr. B. informs us that while away he made a purchase of a thousand acres of pine and is now negotiating for another thousand acres. He also made arrangements for a large steam saw mill and sash, door and blind factory.

Deep Plowing: Useful and Injurious.

Mr. Orange Judd discusses the subject of plowing in the American Agriculturist for April, and among other things says the following:

The sun's warmth greatly assists the preparation of the food material collected by the leaves, adapting it for plant nourishment. We speak of warm "growing weather." But while the hot sun rapidly increasing the preparation of plant food, it dries off the sap faster from the leaves, and also the moisture from the surface soil, so that the roots can not get a full supply. In both these ways the sap—the life blood of the plant—is diminished, and for want of this the food distribution or growth is lessened, and frequently is stopped altogether. The leaves curl, the plants droop, often dying out after a few hot days. This is especially the case on shallow soils, and on prairie land which, by reason of its dark color, absorbs more of the sun's heat than those of lighter color. Owing to the loose texture of such soils they bring up moisture from below much less rapidly than fine, compact loams and clays.

It is not plain than, that if a soil is plowed deep and made fine, so that air will penetrate deeply, and the plant roots be thus invited well below the surface, out of the sun's reach even in a drouth, which seldom dries more than two or four inches deep, the plants having such roots will be always supplied with the needed sap, and the growth will proceed rapidly even in the dryest days. Hence, as a rule, deep plowing and working of the soil are highly advantageous.

But not always. The porous prairie soils are usually in fair condition a foot deep or more; the air has circulated through them, destroying deleterious acids, poisonous salts, etc. On heavier soils, so compact that the air has never circulated below the immediate surface, the subsoil may be actually filled with poisonous substances. We know that earth brought up in digging wells and deep ditches will seldom support vegetable life for a year or two at least. To run a plow down into such a soil three or four inches below the previously stirred surface, and turn up a heavy layer of it, may actually kill the first crop sown or planted.

The right way, with such soils, is to go down an inch or two annually, and bring up a little new soil each time, but not enough to materially harm the growing crops. In this way we may in time secure a healthful, porous, aerated, deep plant bed, that will furnish abundant moisture in the hottest season, besides providing new supplies of inorganic food needed for the best growth of crops.

The American Agriculturist for April is the largest and most brilliant number of that periodical ever issued. It embraces sixty full pages, and contains contributions from a large number of very prominent writers. The great feature of the April Agriculturist is the Engravings. The cover is a new one, and singularly beautiful. There are several full-paged Engravings—over one hundred Engravings and Illustrations in all. Among the contributors we find C. H. Shinn, The Grape Industry of California; Prof. J. W. Sanborn, Experiments with Manures; W. E. Bradshaw, Coffee Planting; C. N. Berkeley, Tobacco Culture; Orange Judd, Deep Plowing; Dr. G Thurber, various articles on Horticulture, etc.; W. W. Meech, Quince Culture; Prof. D. D. Slade, Feeding Stock; T. Goodrich, Sweet Potato Culture; H. A. Haigh, How to get a Farm; C. P. Dewey, Useful Dogs; Dr. B. D. Halsted, Potato "Rot," Chemistry of Farm and Garden, etc.; W. E. Stone, Concerning Starch; D. Z. Evans, Jr., Pear Culture, etc.; Agnes Carr, April Fools' Day—and many others. Among the leading full-page Engravings are: "Spring Has Come;" "Mule Farming in North Carolina;" and a Group of Farm Dogs; four cuts of Kale, and several plants for Vegetable and Flower Garden. Other Engravings are: Rabbit Trap; Sheep Trough; Making Brooms; Corn Marker; Prize Large Barn; Cut-worms; Improved Smoke House (5 cuts.) The Household and Youths' Department are unusually full of interesting and instructive articles, with many Engravings. An exposure of the Lottery Schemes, with list of concerns proscribed by the Government, are found in the Humbug Columns. Price $1.50 per year; 15 cents a single number. Published by Orange Judd Co., 751 Broadway, New York.

Albert Hamre, of Garfield, was in the city on Wednesday greeting his friends. Everything O. K. in Garfield is what he says about it.

Dr. Barnes has removed his dentist office into the Medical Hall building where he is prepared to greet his friends, old and new.

A little wood finds its way to this market, but the roads in the city afford such hard sledding that it is discouraging business.

Mr. Frank Hampson, wife and daughter, of St. Paul, were visiting with the family of Engineer Jack Bunnell during the past week.

Aleck McDonald has returned from his Dakota farm to enjoy the benefits of civilization awhile. He has proved up and rented his farm.

John O'Brien, was in the city from Fisher awhile on Saturday last. He talks of going to some other point to locate in business soon.

Mr. Geo. Tripp, of Mentor, dropped into our headquarters on Monday evening. He reports matters booming in the Maple Lake region.

The hydrant at the corner of Main and Robert has caused some trouble by freezing, but it has been thawed out and put in good working order.

Miss Jessie Pratt is expected to arrive to-day and it is said that in connection with Mrs. E. E. Bangs, she will open a Millinery shop in Dobson's Block.

The JOURNAL was favored with a sample of fruit cake from the Valley Bakery and if we are a judge of cake the Valley Bakery takes the cake.

Government surveyors, we are told are surveying for a lock and dam, at Four Mile Point, on the Red River. It is said the work will cost $150,000.

Mr. M. P. Darrigan was in from the Black River country on Tuesday and reports everybody happy and prosperous, anticipating good times this spring.

Another long train on Monday gave indications of what we may soon begin to expect in the line of immigration.

Boss Hinman is making his calculations to tackle the Presbyterian church building next Monday, when the edifice will be completed as soon as possible

Leech & McManus have their frame up and are whacking away at it. (We have reference to the new real estate building now being built on Broadway.)

The horse trade bids fair to be excellent this season. Already there begins to be much inquiry and several sales are reported at the different sales stables.

Mr. W. D. Bailey returned from the lumber woods near Duluth on Tuesday. In reply to our query as to the D. & M. R. R. he says "I don't know a thing about it."

Now, that we are to have warm weather right away off pretty quick you will need to get a new harness or to get the old one patched up. Go to F. M. Schwark.

Dan McKinnon has his restaurant all papered up in fine style and it is a pleasure to sit at one of his tables and partake of as nice a meal of victuals as the city affords.

Mr. Robert Houston purchased a fine pair of young oxen of Mr. Gates for [illegible] and is now on the warpath to match them with the view of securing a No. 1 breaking team.

Call at Tom Bjoin's stables and see the fine draught horses which he has [illegible]

John O. Juve took a trip to Moorhead this week.

Sargent & Lewis are expecting the arrival, daily, of fresh vegetables.

K. D. Hunter has returned to the city and is building a residence on the hill.

Sargent & Lewis have a fine stock of pipes to suit the most fastidious smoker.

Sargent & Lewis have put in a large Hall's Safe. It is as large as a claim shanty and much more safe.

Farmers are beginning to back up their carts in front of Sargent & Lewis mammoth provision depot after their rations for spring's work.

Don't forget the Baptist social tomorrow evening, at their new chapel on Second Street opposite the Commercial House. A grand time is expected. Don't miss it.

Rev. N. A. Rivers, of Rhode Island, has been appointed as the pastor of the Catholic church of this city. High mass will be celebrated next Sunday, April 1st, at 10:30 o'clock a. m.

Charles Truax started his bakery cart on Saturday and now all you have to do is to leave your orders for any thing you wish in that line. The cart is a daisy—looks quite citified.

A large stock of wall paper and borders at Charlie Davis', corner of Main and Second streets. [46-49]

Victor Von Serenyi, representing the newsy St. Paul Globe is interviewing our citizens in the interest of the Globe. He takes the place of the versatile Ed. Barrett who has gone to Aitkin to start a paper.

W. E. McKinzie, he of the St. Hilaire Spectator, was in the city watching the boom awhile. Mac is doing good work for St. Hilaire but likes to come down and warm and enjoy himself occasionally.

We are selling sash and doors much cheaper than last year, windows from 90 c's. up, doors from $1 90 up.
(47-49) STEWART & LAWRENCE.

It was an eggs-travagant lunch that Charlie Seely set up on Saturday last—in fact there were bushels of eggs, in every color of the rainbow, done to a turn and the boys pronounced them eggs-cellent.

The Baptist sociable will be held in their chapel on Second street, Friday evening, March 30th. A literary and musical programme will be presented, commencing at 8:30 o'clock. Look out for a good time!

A. A. Olds has rented his farm and brought his family to the city, where he will hang out his shingle as a painter. Mr. Olds is said to be a first-class workman and we doubt not he will do well in the city.

A choice farm of 200 acres to rent with or without seed furnished. Good house, stables and well. Call at the Journal office. [47-tf]

Esq. G. W. Lewis is a candidate for re-election. Mr. Lewis has filled the office of justice creditably. He is a worthy and capable officer and we trust that his past services will receive due recognition by the convention.

See the change in the C. O. D. ad and drop in and see what Rosenthal can do for you in the line of clothing, furnishing goods, hats, etc. Don't forget the place, Clement's block, corner of Broadway and Second streets.

Stewart Chapin took a run over to his farm at Larimore to look after his farming operations and to try to lease his own and Fred's farm. If he does not lease he may conclude to farm it himself this summer.

Mrs. I. Brin is now in Philadelphia visiting friends and before her return she will select a large and fine stock of millinery for the spring trade. The ladies are requested to look out for her coming in about ten days.

While the snow does not appear to be going off very rapidly, it is disappearing more rapidly than one would suppose, and soon the ground, which is now bare only in spots, will be in trim for seeding operations. Farmers are getting their implements in readiness for active warfare and will make things hum in earnest shortly.

There will be fun and lots of it at the coming city election. There will no doubt be several tickets in the field and voters should be careful to vote for only the very best among the candidates. Party lines are not drawn, nor should they be, where the only object is to secure the best men. For the various positions the JOURNAL hopes to see the best men elected.

F. M. Schwark, the Second Street harness maker is now prepared to meet all demands in the line of harness that can be made. Light and heavy harness made to order of the very best material and in the most workmanlike manner. He has also added a boot and shoe department, and can furnish boots and shoes, hand made, at a very short notice Call and see F. M.

Mr. J. B. Dow, one of Red Lake Falls real estate boomers was in the city on Saturday posting up in the science of booming. He informs us that he has now got matters so arranged that he is prepared to sell lots cheap and to give a clear title. He thinks the real estate business at the Falls will be lively this spring.

Soren Listoe's head has fallen into the waste-basket—or words to that effect. The President resigned him as Register of the Fergus Falls Land Office and appointed Geo. Boyington in his stead. 'Cause said to be too little regard for civil service rules. By the way, didn't it strike you that the old thing works kind 'o funny, anyhow? Makes a big difference whose ox is gored, eh?

Charlie Seely is bound to keep ahead if he don't lay up a cent. In addition to keeping none but the purest of goods he has added various attractions such as new pictures, a fine music box and a splendid bar mirror. His lunch counter is a drawing card. Charlie is now prepared to receive his friends in good shape.

Andrew Flom came to grief all on account of being too numerous with a check, which appeared to be all O. K., in Tom Bjoin's name. He drew the money on it at the First National Bank and went his way rejoicing. Pretty soon it was ascertained that the check was a forgery and the result of the investigation was that Andrew was lodged in the county jug to await coming events which cast their shadows before. Andrew will doubtless conclude to go to Stillwater to reflect upon his mistake of trying to capture $125 without a sufficient consideration.

The fire bell struck for a fire in the First Ward about noon on Wednesday. Before the fire department could square itself for business, however, the fire had got in its work on a little one story house near the railroad bridge, in fact the fire had got beyond control before the occupants were aware of its existence, and when the alarm was given was beyond control. The house was occupied by Mr. Charles Boucher, who has a wife and six children. A sewing machine and a feather bed were the only things saved from the flames. Mr. B. is a hard working man and the loss will fall heavily upon him.

Of all fool tricks we ever saw was the one we witnessed at the depot on Tuesday. An engine was switching two or three cars in front of the crossing, going south, and two teams were waiting to cross; another engine was coming south at the tank and had nearly reached the depot when the crossing was cleared and the man driving the leading team—Westover, whipped up and attempted to cross despite the energetic howling of the assembled crowd. He checked up a trifle, but only for a moment, when away he went again, the last time barely clearing the track before the engine glided past. It was a close shave and what we call a very foolhardy feat.

The Concert given by Prof. Dusso's music class on Wednesday evening was a grand success in point of attendance, the hall being well filled. Considering the fact that many of the singers were beginners at the time the Professor began his labors the affair reflected great credit upon them as well as upon the Professor's skill as a teacher. The violin exercise by Master Leroy, a lad of 14 tender summers delighted and surprised the audience beyond measure, while the young pianist, Charles Kopp, won golden opinions by his great skill. After the concert those who chose remained and chased the golden hours with flying feet "ayant the twal." Altogether it was voted the boss time.

Mr. W. H. Standish goes to Bartlett, D. T., prepared to locate settlers upon unsurveyed lands, and attend to all matters in connection with their filings. Heretofore it has cost every settler desiring to locate unsurveyed lands a fee of $25 for the survey and this in addition to the usual expenses, such as land office fees, hotel bills and many incidental expenses. Mr. Standish will be prepared to make government surveys of townships at a trifling cost to the settlers and his going to that country may be called providential. We regret to see Mr. Standish leave Polk County as he is an honest, upright, square-dealing lawyer and has been an honored citizen of our county for some years. We take great pleasure in recommending him to all with whom he may have business dealings hereafter knowing that they will find him all and more than all we say of him. His scheme, while it is calculated to benefit the settlers will doubtless yield him an ample return and he deserves all there is in it. We trust that he may decide to return to our county [illegible]

ON THE HARLEM ROAD.

New York's Great Pleasure Drive—Where Grant and Vanderbilt Air their Trotters on a Pleasant Afternoon.

New York Letter to Ohio Times.

New York has only one pleasure drive. It begins at the northern extremity of Central park and, reaching three miles to the Harlem river, extends an indefinite number of miles up the Hudson. Take your stand on the veranda of one of the well-known wayside inns that line the avenue and if the afternoon be pleasant you will see more famous horses in an hour than Boston, Philadelphia or Baltimore can show in a month. It matters little whether William H. Vanderbilt is speeding Maud S. or holds the reins over his magnificent double team of mares, Aldine and Early Rose, or has Small Hopes hitched up, he is the most conspicuous of all the horsemen; for idlers and visitors alike are interested in the man as well as in his horses. He is a picture of contentment as he bowls along. Indeed he has himself said that he takes more pleasure in his horses than in any other of his multitudinous possessions, and he certainly looks to be enjoying himself as, wrapped in a $600 sealskin great coat and tucked in with a $400 sealskin lap-robe, he reclines in a $1,000 top wagon and lets the ribbons hang loose from his $10,000 team or his $100,000 mare. He does not seem to care so much for speeding his fleet steeds as for letting them carry out their own pace. But if General Grant comes rattling up behind or Dan Mace challenges to a spurt Mr. Vanderbilt is quite likely to gather himself up from his lounging position and to straighten the ribbons, and then the dust flies.

Grant exercises on the road every afternoon, starting from home about 2 p. m. he allows his horse to take a 2 26 gait, which, as a rule, is kept up all the way along the avenue. The length of the drive is nearly the same every day, and there is little variation in the route; in fact, residents and idlers along the drive have made out a sort of time-table, which the general is said to follow with wonderful precision. Consequently, if a curious visitor wishes to see the much-honored ex-president he has only to take his position at a window by the roadside at the regulated time that the general is due at that point and he will rarely be disappointed or experience any tediousness in waiting. Grant drives a chestnut mare, Superb by name, but possessing no special qualifications for beauty. She is lean and lank, with an ungainly gait. There are better animals on the road, yet she is of blooded stock and when let out makes good time. Only the other day Superb had a nip-and-tuck brush down the road with Vanderbilt's Lysander and finally drawing ahead held the lead.

The great change in the general's personal appearance has caused considerable comment on the drive this fall and winter. Last year he would be seen generally driving alone in a rather shabby-looking top-wagon. The harness never seemed to shine nor the paint on the wagon glisten. In fact, the whole rig was most sombre. It was also noticeable that his appearance was seedy and decided negligé. His coat was faded and his hands were encased in a pair of shabby sealskin gloves; while the inevitable cigar dangled from his mouth, seemingly about to fall. It was very difficult to imagine that he was the hero of Appomattox and the constant exclamation was, "Why, is that Grant?" If Vanderbilt came along one could not but contrast the more commanding bearing of the railroad king. This season it is different and the general has affected a coy and stylish air. Frequently he comes out in a new silk tie and wears a fresh pair of yellow driving gloves, while his necktie is of the latest fashion. Even his commonplace mare seems to hold her head a little higher, and the harness shines more brightly. In fact, the improvement is noticeable in the whole rig.

"That's all owing to Wall street," said a bystander at one of the inns as he drove past.

At one of the numerous hotels at the bridge Grant stops for refreshment; in other words, to drink, and then returns in the same apparently listless manner. He does not often race, and the police in the park have never had occasion to arrest him for fast driving. He never drives a team and rarely has a friend with him.

Beside the rich magnates with their fast trotters, the sons following in the footsteps of their fathers are making the dust fly with fast horses of their own. James Gordon Bennett, when he is home; Alexander Taylor, Paul Dana, the young Astors and Havemeyers, James R. Keene and a host of others chase one another up to the bridge and beyond. Later in the afternoon the young set are out in full force, startling the nervous old ladies in their ancient chariots, with prim coachmen, as they pass by, cutting in ahead of each other with a reckless abandon. They have had something at the bridge and their blood is up, and they dash down and into the city with terrific speed. Here the fun begins, and a new interest is given to the race, for a mounted policeman looms up, who is quick to detect any violation of the fast-driving regulations and to give chase. As the police are well mounted and experienced riders they press the young reprobates sharply, thus making the race very exciting. The police enjoy it just as much as the young fellows and are happy when occasion gives a chance for a chase. The young scions invariably escape arrest, however.

There are other roads parallel to seventh avenue, and seemingly just as good for driving purposes, but fashion has decided upon the avenue and the city follows fashion's lead. The circuitous roads in Central park all come together at the seventh avenue exit, and from the broad boulevard, or rather "the road" as it is called, which, if not having the fashionable name of similiar drives in Paris, London and Vienna, is sure to equal, if not excel them in the future. Twenty and even thirty carriages can drive abreast, and it is sometimes put to that test. The roadbed is of fine gravel and it is carefully swept and sprinkled every night or during the day if necessary.

At night it is brilliantly lighted, and, with a bright moon, the merry clatter of hoofs and the laughing chatter of joyous girls are heard far into the night. From the park to the bridge, which comprises the main portion of the drive, the roadway is perfectly straight and level. On one side you catch glimpses of the Palisades and the Hudson, broken from view only by the rocky elevations of the river bluff, while on the east side the view consists of Harlem flats, fast being built up with handsome brownstone houses. The best place to see the drive is from the central bridge across the Harlem river. From this point you can look far down the roadway, ablaze with the glitter of carriages and harness and made gay by the bright and varied costumes of the ladies. Every kind of rig is to be seen. Dog-carts, broughams, coupes, coaches, cabs, chariots, phætons and top-wagons trundle along together without abatement.

The Mississippi river will soon be open at St. Paul.

A NON-RELIGIOUS FUNERAL.

That of Charley Thorne, the Popular Actor.

From the New York Sun.

One day, about twelve years ago, Charles R. Thorne, Jr., Stuart Robson, and Robert Craig were discussing the quiet burial of Charles Dickens, and fell to talking about unpleasant funeral sermons that had been preached over actors. Craig said that he would have no clergyman speak at his funeral. "It was then," Mr. Robson said yesterday, "that Thorne, Craig and I made a compact that whoever of us survived the others or another should do what could be done to keep the preacher away from the funeral. Thorne went to Europe. Craig died suddenly. His family insisted on having the usual religious services at the funeral. I told them of Craig's well-known wish in the matter. But they insisted. The minister who conducted the service was an educated man, but he had all the prejudices commoner in his profession then than now and he immediately began to make an apology for the evil which this young man had committed in adopting a profession that had so many evil associations, while his talents in a respectable calling might have brought him great honor. He thought he was justified in asserting that in despite of this Mr. Craig might have a hope of Heaven.

"I told Thorne this when he returned from Europe, and it increased his feeling against such proceedings. He said he did not wish all sorts of people running to his funeral at the Little Church Around the Corner just because he was an actor, and the last word he said to his wife was, 'No preacher; tell Rob.'"

In accordance with this wish of Mr. Thorne, his funeral was conducted early yesterday morning. It was at the house No. 67 Union Place. The coffin, covered with black cloth, lay in the center of the room. The face of the actor was exposed. These members of the profession and friends were in the room. Mr. A. M. Palmer, Will H. Morton, W. H. Crane, Charles R. Thorne, Sr., Will Thorne and his wife, Mrs. John Chamberlain, Walden Ramsey, John Matthews, Dr. Haywood and Stuart Robson and his daughter aided.

At 9:30 o'clock Mr. Robson crossed the room and stood beside the coffin, and said in his peculiar voice:

> It was the often expressed wish of our dear friend, during the illness which resulted in his death, that no performances of a religious nature should be permitted at the funeral. In conformity with this desire let us bid good by to him, briefly and simply.
>
> This man had few enemies and many friends. Narrow men did not love him—generous men did. He was liberal to a fault, honest, manly and true. Those who knew him best loved him best. Hot-tempered at times—as all good men are—it led hastily into an injustice, he as quickly saw his error and rectified it.
>
> It is a source of gratification for us to know that he who lately feared death as the most dreaded of all evils, when the time came welcomed it with all the heartiness of his great nature. His end was peaceful and painless, and he died with the calmness of a sleeping child. He had few regrets for the past, and none for the future. If Charles R. Thorne had faults I never saw them. My great love for the man clouded my judgment perhaps—I could see only the good in him. Last Thursday I saw him for the last time. He asked me in a laughing way if I had any clearly defined ideas in regard to a future state. I replied as vaguely as I could that I supposed the subject was "rather indefinite"; that the more I thought the less I knew, and several other current answers in popular use. He said that during his illness he had read liberally on this theme, and saw nothing more suitable to his views than the following lines: "The future is a dark impenetrable curtain which no human being has ever drawn aside and come back to tell the tale."
>
> The conclusion of my brief task cannot be better reached than by the recital of the following beautiful words from the immortal master's "Tempest," which Mr. Thorne frequently recited with a tenderness which has not been equalled in our time:
>
> These, our actors,
> As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
> Are melted into air—into air,
> And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
> The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
> The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
> Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
> And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
> Leave not a track behind. We are such stuff
> As dreams are made of, and our little life
> Is rounded with a sleep.

Mr. Robson then read this telegram from Robert G. Ingersoll:

> Say what your heart prompts. A few tears, a few words, a few flowers are all that the living can give to the dead. The tragedy has ended; the curtain has fallen; applause cannot lift it up again. But memory and hope remain. Give my sincere sympathy to those who weep.

The pall-bearers lifted the coffin into the hearse, which was driven to the Grand Central depot. The 10:30 o'clock train bore it to Woodland Cemetery. Here, without any words of commitment or farewell, it was placed in a receiving vault.

Unhappy Women.

Women suffering from a weakened condition of the nervous system, nervous prostration, faintness, palpitation of the heart, tremblings, headaches, leuchorrhea, cold extremities, pain in the back, painful periods, bearing down pains, etc., can find sure relief in just one bottle of Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla.

Alabama Prayer Meeting Speech.

"I wish to say to dis yer dyin' congregation what's a sittin' heah befo' me," he began, "dat de collectin' plate will now be passed by Brudder Bednego, and I wish to say to him dat as dar 'pears to be a good many white pussons heah, dat he'd better wait on each one a good while, fur it sometimes takes the gemmen a good while fer to get down into their pockets."

"Brother Mulins" was called upon. He is the golden-tongued orator of the "section," we afterwards learned. He closed the dissertation with this remarkable peroration:

"When the sun am sat to rise no mo' in de eastern horiza; when de stars am shot from deir sockets; when de moon become red as drragging's blood-ah; when de day ob judgment comes suddenly-ah; den de gates ob de Clestial City will be unbarred-ah yes, even de gates o' pearl what opens on de street ob 'bont time fer to go 'roun' 'quirin' ef gold an' brass-ah shell be opened-ah an' de saints ob glory shell parade up de front streets of heaven to the founding ob grace-ah, an' de Lawd shell rise up from off his great white frone-ah, and he shell shake 'em by de hand an' order up deir winges and harpses and crowns ob glory-ah, an' will say to dem, 'Welcome, welcome to heaven, for I am de Lord of Jacob an' David, yea of Noah, Shem, Ham and Japet-ah.'"

What could be more vivid than this picture? All the negroes shouted "Glory," and made others signs of religious excitement. But to recount the numerous singular speeches of the different "orators" would occupy many columns, so I shall have to omit "Brother Scott's" prayer, in which he referred to "Beecher's mis-dominion," and tells how "people wants to go's sailing up to the eternal realms of heaving on beds of flowery ease."—Cor. Graphic Pictures of War.

To the immense pile of war literature which has been published during these eighteen years of peace and which reasonably lays a claim to popular attention, is now added a volume entitled "Bullet and Shell," written by George F. Williams, who served as a volunteer and war correspondent with the armies of the Potomac, Shenandoah and Cumberland.

The volume is full of short anecdotes of a soldier's experiences; of graphic descriptions of the "pomp and circumstances" and "the horrors" of war. Here is a picture of the "pomp and circumstance:"

The sun was shining bright and warm as orders come for the men to rest, the slight breeze being just sufficient to stir the heavy silken folds of the regimental colors as they wave in their tattered elegance. It was a scene for the genius of a Vernet, with all its martial glory and wealth of colors. The bright rays of the sun flashing on a hundred thousand bayonets and sabers, as they were moved at the word of command; the picturesque field batteries, the dashing cavalry, and the long, dark lines of infantry; the parti-colored banners of the corps' division and brigade Commanders, bearing their strange devices of star, crescent and cross—were the salient points in this living, animated picture. It was war in all its pomp and circumstance; and as watched the sunlight play in dalliance on the burnished steel of gun-barrel and bayonet, or followed with curious eye the passage of the clouds, throwing their soft shadows over the assembled host as the breeze carried them swiftly over our heads, I began to feel all that warm delight and enthusiasm that come so naturally to a soldier at a time of holiday and parade. Here was a mighty army, ready for combat and campaign, marshalled in all its massive strength and power. As my eye wandered over the striking scene, my cheek glowed at the brilliance of the scene and the magic of the hour; though I knew this grand review to be but the prelude to a long summer of fatigue, danger and privation.

The following is a fitting companion picture to the foregoing, as showing the other and more real side of war:

As yet no Federal musketry had broken out, our veterans knowing too well the value of every bullet in a crisis like this. Still the assaulting lines continued to march on, until it seemed, from where I was standing, that the leading one touched the breastworks along our center. Then, and only then, a vivid flash sprang from the earth, followed by a sharp rattle as the federal skirmish line opened fire. The volley had no apparent effect on the confederates, who continued to advance steadily, sweeping the skirmishers before them like chaff in the wind. A minute later a deafening crash of musketry broke upon the ear, and we knew that the main line had opened fire. Despite the sunlight, the flame from our men's muskets could be seen as it played to and fro along Cemetery Ridge. Then for the first time the confederate line seemed to waver; but only for an instant, for it soon rallied, and, as if by one common impulse, dashed itself like a mighty wave against the wall of steel before it. The federal artillery on the higher ground behind our infantry now tore the enemies ranks with a storm of iron balls until it seemed that none could stand before them and live. But the troops under Longstreet had gained an impetus which carried them clear up to, and at intervals into, our lines. For twenty minutes the terrible hand-to-hand struggle continued, and I saw, by the sudden movements of Hancocks corps, that his line had been pierced and broken. It was, however, soon re-formed, and although the second line of the confederates joined and strengthened the first, our defense was too fierce and stubborn to be overcome. Finally the attacking force quivered, and a moment later the entire body was in full retreat.

Shall There be Bangs.

From the Wichita (Kan.) Times.

Bangs on a girl gives her an unruly look like a cow with a board over her face. You take the gentlest cow in the world and put a board over her face, and turn her out in a pasture and she gets the reputation of being unruly, and you would swear she would jump fences and raise Hades, and you wouldn't give so much for her by $10 only for beef. Is is so with a girl. If she wears her hair high on her forhead, or brushed back, or even had frizzes, and has a good look, you will go your bottom dollar on her, and you feel she is as good as gold, and that when she tells her young man that she loves him there is no discount on it, and no giggling back; but take the same girl, with her front hair banged and when she looks at you you feel just as though she would hook and you can't trust her. She has a fence-jumping look that makes a young man feel as though he wouldn't feel safe unless she was tied hand and foot, so she couldn't get out of the pasture. A girl with bangs may try to be good and true, but it is awful hard work.

When she looks at herself in the glass and sees the quarter of an inch of forehead she says to herself: "I am dangerous; they want to look out for me." She thinks she is all right, but she is constantly doing that which a girl who wears her hair brushed back would not think of doing. The bang girl may belong to church, and may try to put on a pious look while the hymn is being read. But she will look out from behind those bangs, sidewise, at some meek and lowly young Christian who is trying to get his mind fixed on the hymn, and he will get his mind on her, and it will break him all up, and he won't know whether he is singing "A Charge to Keep I Have" or "She's a Daisy." The bang girl may place her bangs down on the back of the pew ahead of her during the morning prayer, and try to be good, but her corsets will be too tight, and as she hitches around to ease the pain one eye will rise like the morning sun over the back of the pew, and that eye will catch the eye of one young man two seats to the right, who is trying to cover his face with one hand while he tries to keep the flies off the pomade on his hair with the other, and his interest in the praying is knocked into a cocked hat. The banging of the girl's hair changes the whole nature of the little wretch, and she becomes as a gun that is not loaded. You take a picture of "Evangeline" and bang her hair, and she would look as though she would "run at" people. How would Mrs. Van Cott, the alleged female preacher, look with her hair banged? It is just the same with boys. You take a nice, pious Sunday school boy who can repeat 300 verses of the New Testament, and cut his hair with a clipper, and he looks like Tug Wilson.

Oh, My Back!

That's a common expression and has a world of meaning. How much suffering is summed up in it.

The singular thing about it is, that pain in the back is occasioned by so many things. May be caused by kidney disease, liver complaint, consumption, cold, rheumatism, dyspepsia, overwork, nervous debility, &c.

Whatever the cause, don't neglect it. Something is wrong and needs prompt attention. No medicine has yet been discovered that will so quickly and surely cure such diseases as BROWN'S IRON BITTERS, and it does this by commencing at the foundation, and making the blood pure and rich.

Logansport, Ind. Dec. 1, 1880.
For a long time I have been a sufferer from stomach and kidney disease. My appetite was very poor and the very small amount I did eat disagreed with me. I was annoyed very much from non-retention of urine. I tried many remedies with no success, until I used Brown's Iron Bitters. Since I used that my stomach does not bother me any. My appetite is simply immense. My kidney trouble is no more, and my general health is such, that I feel like a new man. After the use of Brown's Iron Bitters for one month, I have gained twenty pounds in weight.

A Stupendous Work of Nature.

Ages ago an arm of the Gulf Mexico extended northward probably to where Cairo now stands. This water varied in width from ten to sixteen miles. Stretching for 1,000 miles northward, and from the Alleghanies to the rocky Mountains, was, and still is, the land that drained its surplus waters into this arm of the sea. Nature sought to fill up this deep triangular trough, the apex of which touched the present waters of the Ohio. The work was an extensive one. The granite flanks of the Rocky Mountains, the shales of the Alleghanies, the tertiary formation of the plains, were all plowed by rivers, and the material was pulverized by the action of strong waters, ground in the batteries of nature until they were an impalpable dust, capable of being held in suspension by flowing water. In the work shop of nature, on the plains and in the mountains, this process ceaselessly continued. The melting snow and heavy rains, causing the rivers to rise, carries the pulp to Cairo. There the salt water of the Gulf was met; and the flow of the river checked unable longer to hold the pulp in suspension, it was precipitated, forming a delta. Slowly this delta was pushed southward. Mountains were cut to the level of the plains; the flanks of mighty ranges were deeply furrowed to supply the demand the river made to fill the trough below Cairo, and rendered it fit for the habitation of men, The north was devastated to answer the call. For ages the process of shoaling the salt waters slowly continued. After the land appeared above the surface of the river the annual overflow added to its height.—[New Orleans Letter to New York Sun.

THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST!
Oregon, Washington & Idaho.
Offers the best field for Emigrants—viz: a mild, equitable, and healthy climate; cheap lands of great fertility, producing all varieties of Grain, Fruit, and Grasses, in wonderful abundance; an inexhaustible supply of Timber; vast Coal Fields, and other mineral deposits; cheap and quick transportation by railroads and river navigation; direct commerce with all parts of the world, owing to its proximity to the Pacific Ocean.
NO DROUTHS, NO INSECT PESTS, NO HURRICANES, WHIRLWINDS, or OTHER DESTRUCTIVE PHENOMENA.
The Lands of the Pacific Northwest show an average yield of wheat per acre largely in excess of that of any other section of the United States.
No failure of crops has ever occurred.
Oregon Wheat commands a higher price than that of any other country in the Liverpool market.
An immense area of very fertile Railroad and Government Lands, within easy reach of the trunk lines of the Northern Pacific R. R., the Oregon Railway & Navigation, and the Oregon & California R. R. Co.'s and their numerous branches in the great Valleys of the Columbia and its tributaries, are now offered for sale at Low Prices, and on Easy Terms, or open to pre-emption and Homestead Entry.
The great movement of population to the Columbia region now in progress will be enormously increased by the completion of the Northern Pacific R. R. and the Oregon Railway & Navigation Co.'s systems. This renders certain a rapid increase in the value of Lands now open to purchase or to entry under the United States Land Laws.

A City Without Homes.

New York Correspondence of the Philadelphia Record.

The majority of New Yorkers feel that they would rather die in New York, where they can have access to the theaters, the boulevards, society, and the countless other attractions of the metropolis, than vegetate in a suburban village. They have lost the old idea of a home. All that they ask is a place to sleep, and in which to receive their friends, and if it is a long, narrow suite of rooms, where sunlight is a luxury, they fill their apartments with rich furniture, bric-a-brac, portieres and pictures, and content themselves with the brilliant display of wealth in a small space. Their home is the world outside. They have the parks, the avenues, and the places of amusement in which to disport themselves. That children grow up into premature and unlovely manhood and womanhood under such influences cannot be a matter of surprise. A life of supreme selfishness, apart from the cozy, quiet pleasures in which the whole family once participated, is not wholesome in its effects, though it be fashioned on the Paris ideal. Even rich people find it convenient to throw off the cares of a household, and it is in obedience to the law of demand that many apartment houses are now in course of construction whose suites of rooms will rent at prices from $200 to $700 or $800 a month. This will reduce the family to narrow quarters, but the location will be "eligible," and the caterer and restaurant will lighten the troubles of the head of the household. Out of such modernized caricatures of homes it is not surprising that a generation of light-headed young folks should emerge, whose centre of happiness is located at Long Branch, Saratoga, the Delmonico ball-room, and the fashionable reception parlor—anywhere rather than where the "old folks" are supposed to be. It is only in novels that they learn anything about the family circle at the home fireside, and it cannot be surprising, therefore, that they wish to leave the household shelter as soon as possible, and go out into the world to seek their fortunes for themselves. This is the change that I have seen creeping over New York in a generation—since the day, five and thirty years ago, when I came to New York a school-boy, and found it a thrifty city of pleasant homes, where each family had its own roof-tree, and where boarding houses were the exception, and flats and tenements were unknown. Perhaps the change has been unavoidable, but it certainly has not bettered the social condition of our people.

The Atlantic Abyss.

The remarkable deep-sea sounding made by the coast-survey steamer Blake last month reveals the existence of an Atlantic depression which, on further exploration, may prove as deep as any in the Pacific. The greatest depth reached was 4,561 fathoms, about seventy-five miles north of San Juan, Porto Rico, and was 686 fathoms lower than the deepest reliable sounding hitherto reported in the Atlantic. The latter was made by the Challenger on March 26, 1873, ninety miles north of St. Thomas, but unfortunately the deep-sea thermometers were shattered under the enormous pressure of four and three-quarters tons to the square inch, and no temperature record was obtained. In the Pacific the deepest soundings yet taken are those taken by the Challenger, near the Admiralty Isles (latitude 2 degrees north, longitude 142 east,) where 4,575 fathoms were found, and by the Tuscarora, in 1874, off the Japan coast, where 4,655 fathoms were recorded.

The officers of the Blake were fortunate in ascertaining the temperature of the abyssal water north of Porto Rico, as it is confirmatory of other observations indicating that the western half of the Atlantic between the tropic and latitude 40 deg. north is warmer than the eastern. The bottom temperature of the profound basin between St. Thomas and Bermuda, is registered by the Blake's thermometer (36) deg., is slightly higher than that of the deepest water south of St. Thomas, the coolness of which, according to Dr. Carpenter, "clearly indicates that an underflow of Antarctic water extends as far north as St. Thomas." It seems, however, too low a temperature for arctic water underrunning the gulf stream and spreading out to so low a latitude as the vicinity of Porto Rico. If the Blake's observation of this bottom temperature is sustained by other soundings in the same region it will apparently establish the views of Sir C. Wyville Thomson that the Antarctic water simply wells up into the Atlantic, and that "water at any given temperature below 39 deg. can only occur in the Atlantic where there is a direct communication with the bed of water at the same temperature in the southern sea, without the intervention of any continuous barrier."

A Bonanza Person on His Travels.

A gentleman, who says he was a fellow-passenger of a newly-elected great man from the far west on his latest eastern trip, has the following story to tell of the bonanza statesman: Before it was fairly dark, the last day of our journey, the great man ordered the porter to make up his section in the sleeper. That done he directed the sable man-chambermaid to get out his night clothes. A gorgeous velvet cap, elaborately decorated, was first procured, carefully examined and hung on one of the hooks where everybody could see it. A magnificent ruffled night-shirt, half smothered in costly point lace of the finest quality, was next brought forth and hung on another peg, so as to fill the space between the looped-up curtains. Everything was in readiness but the great man, who evidently intended retiring early to get a good night's rest, changed his mind, and did not seek his couch until nearly ten o'clock. The passengers had a chance to inspect the superb garment at their leisure, and they availed themselves of the blessed privilege. The ladies feasted their eyes on the embroidered night-cap and on the splendid night-shirt, with its $250 worth of lace trimmings, until their appetites for riches were satiated. The lucky possessor of so much textile splendor pretended to be oblivious to his surroundings, but it was noticed that he witnessed the eager curiosity of his fellow passengers, and listened to the whispered comments with a keen enjoyment he could scarcely conceal. A small boy with a new pair of red-top boots, the only ones in the neighborhood, could not have been more intensely self complacent. If he could only have found an excuse for putting his big diamonds on exhibition his happiness would have been complete and overwhelming.—Washington Republican.

Professor Nordenskjold has sent in a claim to the reward of 25,000 guilders which was offered in 1596 by the Dutch government to any one who should succeed in reaching the Pacific Ocean by way of the Northeast passage.

An English traveler in America records as one of his observations the general sadness on the faces of our men of affairs as they go about the streets.

REMUS'S AND HIS FRIENDS.

"Miss Sally" and the Tree Man.

The other day Uncle Remus had an opportunity to kill two kinds of birds with one stone—an opportunity which he proudly but quietly made the most of. Last year a consumptive-looking young man came into the front yard where the negro was working, and after walking around and examining the shrubbery suggested that appearances could be materially improved by the addition of a few trees and flowers. Uncle Remus resented the familiar way in which the young man went nosing about, and he resented the intimation that the yard wasn't as nice looking as he and Miss Sally could make it.

"Where is the lady of the house?" inquired the young man.

"Who? Miss Sally?" responded Uncle Remus, leaning confidently upon his rake. "She is dar, some'rs, I spect." The tone was not conciliatory.

"I guess I can sell her some ornamental trees and some nice flowers," said the young man.

"Goodness knows w'at she want wid um. Kase she done got all the sorts and sizes wa'at'll grow roun' yer. I dunner wharbouts she gwineter put um."

But the young man rang the bell, and pretty soon he was engaged in showing the lady through a large portfolio containing pictures of flowers and trees. These pictures were not beautiful, but they were casually attractive. They were gaudy. The green of the trees looked like it could be stirred with a stick, and the flowers were all in a state of inflammation alarming to behold. But the young man was a good talker. His fluency seemed to lend a sort of perspective to the glare of the pictures. His persuasiveness softened the harsh outlines and gave tone to the whole. Uncle Remus sang aggressively while this was going on, but no one paid any attention to him. The lady purchased $20 worth of trees, shrubs, and flowers, and the young man went on his way rejoicing.

In due time the order was filled, the plants set out, and the young man collected his money not without a protest from the lady's husband, in which Uncle Remus heartily joined. Most of the flowers withered, but several of the trees and shrubs grew and thrived. Some of them Uncle Remus recognized as soon as they put forth in the spring, and as soon as he had verified his recognition by careful comparison, he dropped his work, went to the horse lot slipped under the buggy shelter, and laughed until he was exhausted.

But he held his peace. Lately, however, his Miss Sally has been teasing him so unmercifully about his appearance in the recorder's court that he has been compelled to make some counter-demonstration, and the other day it culminated in an undoubted victory for the old man. He began it very cunningly. When he was sure his Miss Sally could hear him, he would talk rapidly to himself in a low tone, and then break into a fit of laughter that appeared to be uncontrollable. Then he would suddenly grow serious, sigh heavily, groan, shake his head, and proceed with his work in a forlorn, dejected sort of way. This went on day after day, until his Miss Sally began to have serious doubts of the old man's sanity.

"If you go on this way, you will land in the lunatic asylum, instead of in the recorder's court." she exclaimed one day, after Uncle Remus had gone through with one of his paroxysms of laughing and groaning. "Come! I want you to behave yourself; I don't want any crazy niggers around here."

Uncle Remus's only relief was a groan and that was all the explanation or excuse he designated to offer.

But the next day everything was made clear. The lady was in the flower-yard giving Uncle Remus some directions, when he suddenly dropped his hoe, and called out to some person going by.

"Boss!—Oh, Boss!"—I wish you step this way a minit ef you please, sir." It was the consumptive looking nursery agent. He was evidently in a hurry, and hesitated about stopping. He pulled out his watch nervously.

"I declare, Uncle! I—er—I haven't hardly—"

"Dess a minit, Boss," said Uncle Remus in an insinuating tone. "Man come by yer to-day en ax me whar you live, kaze he say he wanter git some er dem sud's w'at you bin selling."

Glancing at the lady, and seeing that she was paying no attention to him, the plausible young man seemed to recover his assurance. He drew out his note-book.

"What was the gentleman's name? I should be glad to supply him."

Uncle Remus took off his hat and scratched his head slowly.

"Lem—me—see—look lak I oughtn'ter fergit dat man name off'n my mine He come 'long yer day 'fo' yistiddy, and low, he did:

"Dem mighty nice s'ubs en trees you got dar. Whar you git 'um?"

"Wid dat, I ups en sez, s'I 'Dey's a young gentermun w'at fetches um 'roun en I'll tell 'im 'bout you.' s'I.

"Do so,' s'e 'en ef he fotch you dat ar swamp poplar, en dat ar sycamo', en dat ar sweetgum, en dat ar honey-suckel bush, I want some er de same kine. Dey are mighty scase 'roun' yer,' s'e."

The lady who had been pretending to arrange a rose-vine, turned around at this, but the enterprising agent was gone.

"Remus!" she exclaimed, in a tragic voice "call that man back."

Uncle Remus called him, but the man never turned his head, and he soon disappeared around the corner. There was no tag on the sweet-gum tree, but that on the honey suckle read "rhododendron," that on the sycamore "American plane-tree," and that on the swamp-poplar "American tulip tree."

Uncle Remus's Miss Sally went into the house, and at dinner time he learned that she had gone to bed with a sick headache. Just before night, "Miss Sally" felt well enough to get up, and when her husband came home he found her going about the house in a subdued, half-reproachful way, with her head tied up. She had intended to say nothing of the swindle of which she was the victim, but after supper Uncle Remus engaged the cook in conversation, and, after some palaver, his Mars John heard him exclaim, with well feigned indignation:

"Dat w'at makes I say wa't I does. When folks treats nice w'te 'oman ez Miss Sally in dat away, den hit's des dey's any law in deze Nunitety States."

His Miss Sally also heard him, and she became thoroughly indignant.

"If you don't clear out of that dining-room, you miserable old wretch," she exclaimed, "I'll brain you with the coal scuttle."

Whereupon she cried and told her husband all about it, and this hard-hearted man laughed so immoderately that Miss Sally fluttered off to bed in a huff.

When the gentleman went to close the house for the night, he found Uncle Remus sitting contentedly by the drawing-room fire.

"I spec', Miss Sally mighty mad," said the old philosopher, when he was able to control his laughter, "[illegible] promise me. Dey er up dar in dat ar left-hand side box drawer," he [illegible] "en de key, hit's up dar on de top she'f. D'n't git um all, Mars John, kase Miss Sally 'll be a fightin' on ter me."—Atlanta Constitution.

THE WALNUTVILLE LYCEUM

A Correct Account of the Doings of One Evening's Entertainment.

From the Drawer of the March Harpers.

Mrs. Brown having a lecture upon the Parthenon, was invited to deliver it before the lyceum of Walnutville. Knowing, of Walnutville only that it was 15 miles from a railroad, Mrs. Jones suggested a more popular subject. No; Walnutville wanted the Parthenon. At the station named in the letter of direction Mrs. Brown saw a stage, and soon the driver said:

"Be you the lecturer for Walnutville?"

"Yes."

"Wa'al, git right in; and you hain't no need to pay no fare neither, for I'm the committee that wrote you."

Mrs. Brown was the only passenger, and the driver cheered the long and lonely way by telling her. "Folks was thinking a sight obout seein' on her, lots on 'em remembrin' her grandsir." They were only four hours on the road and when the time for the lecture came Mrs. Brown was escorted to the hall by the same gentleman. On the way he exhorted her to speak up, and not be like "them Methodist wimmen, who mumbled so folks did not know when to say 'Hallelujah.'" The hall, an unpainted building, consisted of a great room with an enormous out side door opening directly in to it. There were seats against the wall upon two sides, which the stage-driver explained as being the place where "the old men sot town-meetin' days." The people who were in their seats turned around and gazed at Mrs. Brown while she took off her wraps and put on her gloves. Telling her escort she was ready, he said he "warn't a-goin' upon that roostrum to make a tool of himself; the minister had got to do that."

While waiting for the minister, and enduring the staring of the audience, Mrs. Brown diverted her mind by wondering why a row of men were seated at the back of the platform. Finally curiosity conquered.

"What are these men in here for?"

"Them? Why, they're the Walnutville brass-band, and they're going to play. Don't they have no bands where you come from?"

Fortunately Mr. Snow, the minister, appeared then, and Mrs. Brown trailed meekly up the aisle after him. Obedient to his gesture, she sat down, and he said, we will unite in prayer.

That exercise disposed of, Mr. Snow proceeded: "The Walnutville brass-band will favor us with 'Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean.'"

The performance was stunning, deafing; but, before breath or hearing could be regained, the agile clergyman was again on his feet:—

The chorister of the Baptist church will now delight the audience with a song—'There's a good time coming, boys; wait a little longer.'"

"The chorister walked slowly to the platform and waited, looking severely at Mr. Snow.

"I forgot to say," shouted that much-afflicted man, "that he will be accompanied by his daughter on a Mason and Hamlin instrument."

Then the the father and daughter mounted the stage, the organ was wheeled into its place, and the performers had a good time, if nobody else did. The audience was indifferent to an alarming degree, looking to Mrs. Brown like scores of duplicates of the goddess of Pasht who sits and glares at people in the British museum.

Again Mr. Snow: "Mrs. Brown will now read us a piece on the Parthenon."

Mrs. Brown stepped to the front, and amidst stiness so profound that she could hear the breathings of persons near her, read her piece. It took an hour, and during all that time the death like quiet was broken but once; and then a boy who had climbed up on the outside, and peeped in at the window informed his companions in a hoarse whisper that "she warn't no great to look at, anyhow." Not a hand stirred nor even an eyelid moved when the Parthenon was ended, but Mr. Snow allowed no time for embarrassment, for he was at once on his feet.

"The chorister of the Methodist church will sing 'Rocked in the cradle of the deep.' He will accompany himself."

The same masterly indifference while the Methodist chorister rocked himself violently backward and forward, and while he was wiping his heated brow after he had returned to his seat. But indefatigable Mr. Snow knew no weariness.

"The band will again delight us with 'Marching Through Georgia.'"

"Hark! From the Tombs," would have suited the temper of the audience equally as well—to all appearance better. Finally the minister concluded:

"These exercises will close with a benediction."

He had hardly spoken its last words when the stage driver shouted:

"Plans have been drawn for a $50,000 hotel at Rapid City."

"Here, marm, is the money we've took. You can take your pay out of it."

Mrs. Brown, not accustomed to approving herself, declares she rose to that occasion, for she turned all the money into her pocket-hankerchief and told him she would settle on her way to the train. One or two people walked solemnly up to her, limply shook her hand and said, plaintively: "We have enjoyed your lecture," but with these exceptions the awful silence was not disturbed. To this Mrs. Brown is in doubt if they think the Parthenon an improved sewing-machine or a new kind of hay-spreader.

Onion Eating.

The following article, clipped from an exchange, reminds us forcibly of our own experience. Onions were never used in our boyhood's home, because of father's intense dislike to even the slightest odor of them, and the children all grew up with the same antipathy for the valuable non-scorbutic. But the matrimonial step placed us in companionship with one who had a special weakness for the article, and we decided that having performed the feat of cultivating a taste for tomatoes, we might give onions a trial. The result, after a few short lessons, was all that could be desired, and if there is any one thing in the vegetable line that we dote on, whose delicate flavor exhilerates all the organs of taste and smell, in unison, it is the onion.

"An onion is the most villfied and worst traduced esculent there is, and yet it is one of the most delicious to some persons that the earth produces. There is one thing that it lacks and that is popularity. I know men who, if they experience the slightest whiff of an onion, become so sick that they are in the deepest imaginable misery for hours thereafter. What I say is no exaggeration in the least. Assistant Prosecuting Attorney Hooper is afflicted that way. On the other hand there are those who [illegible] passionately fond of onions, that they would rather eat a mess of them than the finest dinner [illegible] Hon. General Samuel F. Hunt, of Ohio, [illegible] told me once that every time he [illegible] makes a specialty of raising a particularly fine species of onions, he eats so many that he is ashamed of himself. Many a time he slips off to a restaurant and enjoys a feast of his favorites in several courses. He says those are the happiest moments of his life. To the traveling man the onion is the best friend in the world. You can't think of any shape that an onion is not good in, boiled, stewed, fried, baked, fricassed, escolloped, roasted, pickled or raw they are palatable and delicious. Cooked with potatoes, beefsteak, turkey or duck they are exceedingly savory. Just let a fellow banging around the country, disgusted with the fare he receives at out-of-the way hotels or boarding-houses, eat a raw onion and see how it will brace him up. If you have taken too much tea of an evening, and feel the worse for your bout the next morning, manage to get outside of an onion or two, and see how it will help you. Onions are excellent cure for heavy colds, as everybody knows. Then when a fellow becomes wakeful, just let him fill up on nice sliced onions. Gracious to goodness, what a comfortable drowsiness will come over him! He forgets all care, and sinks into a regular old-fashioned, forty-knot snooze that does him a power of good I tell you."

Generalties.

The British government has controlled the telegraph wires for over ten years. The increase in the number of messages sent is remarkable. In 1870-71 the total number of dispatches was only 9,850,177; in 1881-82 it had risen to 31,345,861. After deducting about 6,000,000 press and government messages, it appears that the average number of private dispatches last year was about three for each four persons in the United Kingdom.

According to Le Progres Militaire, the number of suicides in the German army has of late been increasing at an alarming rate. In 1879 there were 195, in 1880 the number rose to 250, and in 1881 to 262. During the two years last named the total number was divided among the different ranks as follows: Eighteen sergeant majors, forty sergeants, sixty-nine corporals, and three hundred and fifty-six privates. The majority of the cases of suicide occurred in the 11th army corps (Hesse-Nassau.)

Green hair is coming into fashion in Paris. Already several beauties of the first rank have been observed in the boxes at the theaters whose heads were in "youthful verdure clad" in the literal sense of the word. Unfortunately for the obsequious devotees of fashion, it is no easy matter to dye the hair green. This color can only be imparted to white hair. Hair of any other color must first be died white.

Miss Anna Parnell writes to a friend in St. Louis declining to become the almoner of any Irish relief fund, because "charity given now will create more distress than it relieves. The lack of food and impending famine over parts of Ireland have been brought most deliberately on the country by the people themselves, by the way in which they have gone on paying rent, in spite of everything that has been done to induce them to refrain from so suicidal a course."

The American and Chinese News defends the Chinese from the charge of ignorance by saying that China now possesses a greater body of literature than Europe can show. It is now known by all intelligent people that the empire contains a large and wealthy middle class; that a Chinaman who can neither read nor write is a rarity; that the rights of property are everywhere respected; that education is universal, and ignorance is reputed a crime; and that as a Chinese mandarian told the people of Philadelphia some few years past, in excellent English. "If, after a rule of three years, the head of the city in China does not improve his people in morality and intelligence, he cannot be promoted; and if a school teacher, during the same period, make a similar failure with his pupils, he loses his position."

A Baptist clergyman who was just from Leadville thinks it the wickedest town in the world. In the first place the church which called him there lied to him in saying that there were 130 members, that the building would seat 500 persons, and that a parsonage was ready. The church seated 140 persons, there were forty-nine church members, and the parsonage had been sold and the church society was $900 in debt. Next to the church was a blacksmith shop, and the blacksmith was just as busy on Sunday as on week days. The minister had to go out just before the sermon and ask the blacksmith to stop. The blacksmith told him to go to a place considerably warmer than Florida, and added that he was working for a member of his church. And sure enough, there stood the Treasurer of the church having his horse shod.

The Fascionations of the Stage.

From New York letter.

I observe that the repearance of Minnie Conway is announced. It is another illustration of the remarkable fascination that the stage has for people who once tread its boards. Many years ago Minnie Conway's father and mother were very well known theatrical people. Mr. Conway built a handsome theatre in Brooklyn, which has since burned down, sacrificing hundreds of lives. He was years the most popular actor in the City of Churches.

One day he died of apoplexy. Then his wife, who played the heroine to all his roles took charge of the theatre, and managed it successfully for some years' Then she, too, died. They left two charming daughters, both of whom enjoyed some reputation as actreses. After the death of both their parents, these daughters, one nineteen and the other twentyone years of age, were left absolutely penniless, as their parents, with the actor's usual lack of foresight, had failed to accumulate anything for their support. One of them, the younger, went to a stock theatre in Philadelphia, and before she had been there three months was married to a wealthy young banker. For two years she was a pet in certain circles of Philadelphia society, though the straighter-laced old citizens of the place refused to recognize her. She wore magnificent dresses, and had a model home. Everything pointed to a long and pleasant social life; but her inclination for the stage was too strong for her to resist. For another year she fought it out, and then became so unhappy and morose that for her own sake husband allowed her to go on the stage again. It was an instinct that she could not withstand. Once on the boards again she became perfectly happy, and experienced once more that wildest intoxicant to the female heart, the applause of the public. Meanwhile the other sister sought an engagement at the Fifth Avenue Theatre in New York. Her name was Minnie. She did not get the position at once, though they promised to engage her the next year. Then without any one suspecting her intentions, she suddenly married Levy, the cornetist, and settled down in apartments on [illegible] to spend the rest of her life in retirement [illegible] for five years, growing more unhappy every day. [illegible] husband, who boots the cornet. For years it [illegible] Everybody said that Minnie Conway could not remain contented off the stage. For a wonder, everybody was right. At last she has decided to come back, and she makes her reappearance at the Bijou Theatre in 'Heart and Hand.'"

AGAINST THE WORLD.

A Very Celebrated Running Race Recounted by One Who Saw It.

Josiah Quincy's Reminiscences.

On the 27th of May, 1823, nearly fifty-seven years ago, there was a great excitement in the city of New York, for on that day the long expected race of "Eclipse against the world" was to be decided on the race-course on Long Island. It was an amicable contest between the north and south. The New York votaries of the turf—a much more prominent interest than at present—had offered to run Eclipse against any horse that could be produced, for a purse of $10,000; and the southern gentlemen had accepted the challenge. I could obtain no carriage to take me to the course, as every conveyance in the city was engaged. Carriages of every description formed an unbroken line from the ferry to the ground. They were driven rapidly, and were in very close connection; so much so that when one of them suddenly stopped, the poles of at least a dozen carriages broke through the panels of those preceding them.

On arriving we found an assembly which was simply overpowering; it was estimated that there were over 100,000 persons upon the ground. The conditions of the race were four-mile heats; the best two in three; the course was mile in length. A college friend, the late David P. Hall, had procured for me a ticket for the jockey-box, which commanded a view of the whole field. There was great difficulty in clearing the track, until Eclipse and Sir Henry (the southern horse) were brought to the stand. They were both in brave spirits, throwing their heels high into the air; they soon effected that scattering of the multitude which all other methods had failed to accomplish. And now a great disappointment fell, like a wet blanket, on more than half the spectators. It was suddenly announced that Purdy, the jockey of Eclipse, had had a difficulty with his owner and refused to ride. To substitute another in his place seemed almost like giving up the contest; but the man was absolutely stubborn, and the time had come. Another rider was provided and the signal for the start was given. I stood exactly opposite the judge's seat where the mastering excitement found its climax. Off went the horses, every eye straining to follow them. Four times they passed by the judge's stand, and every time Sir Henry was in the lead. The spirits of the Southerners seemed to leap up beyond control, while the depression of the more phlegmatic north set in like a physical chill. Directly before me sat John Randolph, the great orator of Virginia, a man to be noticed more particularly in a succeeding paper. Apart from his intense sectional pride he had personal reasons to rejoice at the turn things were taking; for he had bet heavily on the contest, and, it was said, proposed to sail for Europe upon clearing enough to pay his expenses.

Half an hour elapsed for the horses to get their wind, and again they were brought to the stand. But now a circumstance occurred that raised a deafening shout from the partisans of the North. Purdy was to ride. How his scruples had been overcome did not appear, but there he stood before us, and was mounting Eclipse. Again, amid breathless suspense; the word "Go!" was heard, and again Sir Henry took the inside track, and kept the lead for more than two miles and a half, Eclipse followed close on his heels and, at short intervals attempted to pass. At every spurt he made to get ahead, Randolphs' high-pitched and penetrating voice was heard each time shriller than before: "You can't do it Mr. Purdy! You can't do it, Mr. Purdy! You can't do it Mr. Purdy!" But Mr. Purdy did do it. And as he took the lead what a roar of excitement went up! Tens of thousands of dollars were in suspense, and although I had not a cent depending, I lost my breath, and felt as if a sword had passed through me. Purdy kept the lead and came in a length or so ahead. The horses had run eight miles, and the third heat was to decide the day. The confidence on the the part of the southern gentlemen was abated. The manager of Sir Henry rode up to the front of our box and calling to a gentleman, said, "You must ride the next heat. There are hundreds of thousands of southern money depending on it. That boy don't know how to ride; he don't keep his horse's mouth open!" The gentleman positively refused, saying that he had not been in the saddle for months. The manager begged him to come down and John Randolph was summoned to use his eloquent persuasions. When the horses were next brought to the stand, behold the gentleman appeared, booted and spurred, with a red jacket on his back, and a jockey cap on his head. On the third heat Eclipse took the lead and by dint of constant whipping and spurring, won by a length, this closely contested race.

There was never contest more exciting. Sectional feeling and heavy pecuniary stakes were both involved. The length of time before it was decided, the chance of riders, the varying fortunes, all intensified the interest. I have seen the Derby races; but they finish almost as soon as they begin, and were tame enough in comparison to this. Here for nearly two hours there was no abatement in the strain. I was unconscious of everything else, and found, when the race was concluded, that the sun had actually blistered my cheek without my perceiving it. The victors were of course exultant, and Purdy, mounted on Eclipse, was led up to the judges' stand, the band playing "See the Conquering Hero Comes." The Southerners bore their losses like gentlemen, and with a good grace. It was suggested that the comparative chances of Adams and Jackson at the approaching presidential election should be tested by a vote of the gathering. "Ah," said Mr. Randolph, "if the question of the presidency could be settled by this assembly there would be no opposition. Mr. Purdy would go to the White House by acclamation."

I have thus endeavored to describe, from my journey of this period, the first great contest between the North and the South—a contest in which the grandfathers of many of my readers were deeply interested. It seems to have foreshadowed the sterner conflict that occurred forty years afterward. The victory resulted in both cases from the same cause—the power of endurance. It was, in the language of the turf, bottom against speed. The north has no braver men than were found in the confederate ranks; it had no abler generals than Lee and Jackson. It had only greater resources. Let us hope that, as on the former occasion, the gentlemen of the south will acquiesce in a result that neither valor nor skill can avert, and that, [illegible] advance the virtue, prosperity, and glory of our common country.

FIELD AND FARM.

Farming Notes.

Breeding geese are in their prime from 3 to 5 years old. The gander should be a year older. Eggs from young geese do not hatch so well, the goslings are not so strong, hardy or large as those bred from older birds. One gander to three is sufficient, but if only two are kept with him it is much better, as the gander is really inclined to be monogamist. If geese are well fed during winter they will begin to lay early in March from eight to twelve eggs. They generally give two or three litters in a season, varying from six to ten eggs at a time, according to breed, feed and care given them.—N. E. Farmer.

A Russian grain merchant is reported as saying: "The American cheap grain has completely undermined us. It is clear that we cannot compete with our trans-Atlantic friends. Do you think that a man with a hoe can compete with a man with a steam plow? That represents our respective conditions. Our agriculture is in a primitive state; and our transportation in its infancy; In spite of dear labor, American grain costs the producer one-half as much as Russian grain; and besides in America an acre of cultivated soil yields three times as much as we get from our soil, which as yet knows no manure."

A process in ham-curing, practiced in some of the leading packing houses, consists in creating the smoke in an oven outside of the smoke house and passed through underground pipes into it. The smoke, rising from the floor to the top of the house, encounters two opposite currents of air drawn from the outside. These currents cause the smoke to form into a rapidly revolving horizontal column which passes among the hams. The smoke is not warm, and there is no heat to melt the hams or hot air to blacken them. The hams under this process are smoked in very much less time than by the old method.

A writer in Vick's Magazine gives the following method for growing dandelions, which find a ready sale: Sow the seed in drills six inches apart, on light, rich soil. When six inches high shear off the tops to three inches, and transplant in rows twelve by twenty-four inches apart. The plants will be ready for market the following spring. When the buds begin to start the plants are ready for use. Cut the stem just below the ground, so that the leaves will not fall from the crown. Bunch like asparagus, two pounds to the bunch. A yield of a ton from a bed of 8,000 plants is not unusual. The plant does not attain its full growth until the second year. The correspondent gets from 15 to 30 cents per bunch, so that his bed of 8,000 plants would bring him, at an average of 20 cents a bunch, $160, and this from a little less than one-third of an acre.

The Children's Garden.

I wish all mothers would try the experiment of giving their little ones a bit of ground near the doors, where they can make a garden. I have urged it before in these columns, and I am sure of its being a success. Most children love flowers and their tastes can be cultivated. Put in a bright flowering plant—a scarlet verbena, geranium and anything else you choose. Let them have seeds and learn how to plant them, and you will be surprised how the little ones of two, three or four years of age will spend happy hours around that little spot. If under the shade of a tree, all the better—only let them know it is a real garden and that it is their very own. It will be a "joy forever," and you will not regret trouble and expense in its establishment.—Rural New Yorker.

Near to Your Boy's Heart.

It is a pleasure to see Walter D. come into the house. He is a noisy, stirring boy out of doors, as fond of play as any one, but he leaves the roughness outside. When he enters he hangs his hat on the rack, as a matter of course; takes a view of himself in the glass, and gives his hair one or two pats and a brush with his hands, just from habit; and if he finds his face and hands needs washing he passes out into the shed and washes them. Then, with head up and cheerful air, he hunts about until he "finds mother" up-stairs or down. After that he sits down beside her and gives her a little account of the day. He never would do that if he was not sure of the fullest sympathy in all his haps or mishaps. He is just as sure to tell over his blunders, for he knows mother's heart and head so well. She can love him for all that and suggest a way out of all difficulties. It is a happy thing for a mother to live so near her boy's heart, and it is a blessed thing for the boy. It saves him from a thousand snares and temptations, and it is something that will hold him with a magic power when her head is low.

A man who had wandered far and wide and been exposed to many temptations, said that often he had been held back by the seeming pressure of his mother's hand on his head and her loving voice saying, "My son do not this great wickedness nor sin against thy God." I wonder if the young man Joseph did not have a good many such memories to give him strength amidst the temptations of an Egyptian court.

Depend upon it, we must be a great deal to our little boys or we shall not be very much to our grown up ones. We must wisely restrain and guide them; teach them orderly, respectful ways, and with it all keep them very close to our hearts. Many little lads have a hungering for a mother's kiss and loving caress, which they almost never get. The cares of this life make our cumbered Marthas forgetful and careless of their little deeds of love, which are of so much worth to the little ones and take really no appreciable time. They are much more ready with a hasty reproof, and, alas, some with a hasty blow, than with an endearing word. God help and pity the little ones brought up in such homes! Too often their hearts harden early, and they soon learn to stay away in the evening to scenes more congenial. The enemy of the children rejoices when a child is in effect driven out from his home at nightfall by a mother's sharp words. It is good to have the children love home and love mother's side at evening, and a woman need ask no higher praise in this life than such a compliment from her children.

What God's Law Does for Woman.

From Dr. Dix's Lecture on Divorce.

Let the woman remember that it is the religion of Jesus Christ which has sanctified her person and exalted her sex; that every word which Christ uttered touching her in her relation to man, as maid, as wife, as widow, is for her a word of life; that there is not, and cannot be, a work more urgent for her, or more essential to her safety and honor, than to see that those words of Christ are kept perpetually before the world; [illegible] the very talisman of social security. [illegible] the woman one flesh; it gives [illegible] volt from God tends to divide the man and wife, treats them as two independent persons, gives the woman a separate position and separate interests. From this state it is an easy step to personal separation. But when, if ever, woman attains a complete independence she may find herself crushed under burdens too great for her to bear. Then this will be the history: That she whom God lifted up from the state of concubinage and slavery and crowned with honor and glory as a Christian wife will, after having turned away from God to follow her own desires, sink back to be once more man's slave and concubine. The conditions may vary to match the altered aspects of the world; the thing will be the same; the lapse will be into the old misery and bitterness, and once more shall the iron enter into her soul and the fetters be riveted to her limbs, and there shall be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth.

Currants and Gooseberries.

Massachusetts Ploughman.

Roots for new plantations can be easily grown from cuttings, providing they be planted out in the autumn or very early in spring; if properly cared for, the roots in one year will be in good condition to transplant, and will be better than old roots. As to varieties for market, the Versailles occupy the front rank; but for home use the old Red Dutch, when well grown, is good enough, and sometimes we think, considering its hardiness, productiveness and good flavor, it has few, if any superiors; it is true it is not as large as some, and therefore does not sell as well, but for home use quality is of more importance than size; but for size under high culture it is quite respectable; we have grown them one-half an inch in diameter. In a large plantation the bushes should be set in rows five feet apart and three and one-half feet in the row; clean culture should always be practiced, and besides keeping the currant worm off, the greatest care should be taken to destroy the worm that works in the stalks of the bushes. In some localities this enemy is very troublesome; they eat out the pith of the stalks and finally kill them; the first indication of their presence is the changing of the leaves to a yellow color; a few weeks after the whole bush dies. We do not think much of the gooseberry in the green state, even for cooking, the skin is so tough it makes very indigestible food; but a ripe Houghton seedling, eaten the same as a grape, by rejecting the skin, is exceedingly good eating, and when taken at just the right time, is never refused, when once tried even by the most fastidious.

New Mode of Treating Tomatoes.

Correspondence Country Gentleman.

My practice is to excavate in the early spring time as many flat turnips as are needed, and having filled the cavity with earth, plant two or three seeds in it, selecting the best plant when two or three inches high, to remain, and pulling out the others. When it is time to set them in the garden place the turnip with its contents undisturbed in a hole deep enough to cover the turnip two or three inches. Setting out in this way there is no cutting away of the roots and little need of water, as the plant has not been in the least disturbed, especially if inured to the air out of doors for a week or two before being set out in the garden. I have started tomatoes out so early that the plants were in blossom several days before being set out, not being at all retarded thereby. Cucumbers started in the same way I have had in bloom with the same result. After being put in the ground the turnip soon decays, furnishing a little food for the plant. If the turnips are to be kept long in the house before setting out it will be well to put them in boxes, filling the interstices with moss, sand or earth, kept moist, as too long exposure to the hot air of a warm place will cause the turnips to wilt, the earth in which must be kept moist, whether the turnip is in or out of a box.

How I Raise a Calf.

Mrs. J. P. Walters in the Kansas Farmer.

We are all interested in the rearing of good stock on the farm, and, to have such, good care, good feed and plenty of water, with good, warm, dry shelter, are the requisites. Now to begin with, if we want to have a good large, thrifty yearling, and from that on, we must begin right. Have the foundation good, and you will be rewarded by having good large 2 and 3-year-olds. Don't stint, but from the first feed liberally. I will tell how I feed, as some one gave their method some time back. I let the calf suck till the milk is good; then put it in a warm stall near the cow; milk the cow and give the calf the finger after it has got real hungry, and when it begins to suck lower the head into the milk, and in most cases the work is done. Now it will take the fresh, warm milk, for one week. (Feed the cow good warm slop feed once or twice a day, to make her give plenty of milk.) Now it is two weeks old, and [illegible] give the calf some sweet, skimmed milk, putting more fresh milk. At the end of the third week give it a little new milk, and increase the quantity of skimmed milk to at least five quarts in all at a feed twice a day. At four weeks set all the milk to skim, and begin to feed a little porridge made as follows: One and one-half pint boiling water, stir slowly one big cookspoonful of graham, or the same of white flour and shorts; let it boil well; put in milk, and give by this time at least eight quarts at a feed. At five or six weeks begin to feed a little corn and bran. At two months old increase the porridge to one gallon of boiling water, stir in slowly one pint of common shorts; let boil well, and give it less milk; say two or three quarts of milk in the porridge. Always feed warm. Let the calf have plenty of hay, or fodder, millet or sheaf oats. All are good. Now, I should say, in making the porridge be sure and put a teaspoonful of salt in each feed. It will not hurt your calf. My word for it, Mr. Rustic's experience to the contrary. Feed as I direct, and you will not have calves looking like they had been knocked in the head with the churndash. I have two fine calves, raised as above, that will be ready to go on the range as soon as grass comes.

The River Route to Europe.

St Louis Republican; Some people in Chicago and the East pretend to ridicule the Mississippi Barge line. And yet the boats, in the two weeks between Feb. 20 and March 6, took down the river from this city 1,160,000 bushels of corn and 350,000 bushels of wheat, besides flour, provisions, etc. It takes a mighty good railroad to do better than that. A new steamship line with regular sailings, perhaps as often as weekly, is about to take the route between New Orleans and Liverpool, and still another that between New Orleans and Havre. If, now, our importers will bring their goods this way, instead of through New York, the Mississippi valley, from St. Louis south, may boast a declaration of independence of the rival trunk lines with their pools, combinations and [illegible] on the river, save as is acquired by legitimate enterprise.

THE PARDONER.

He is the Pardoner, and his Scripture hath—
"Paradise is for them that check their wrath,
And pardon sins; so Allah doth with souls;
He loveth best him who himself controls."
Know ye of Hassan's slave? Hassan the son
Of Ali. In the camp at Ras-al-had
He made a banquet unto sheikhs and lords,
Rich dressed and joyous; and a slave bore round,
Smoking with new cooked pillaw, Badhan's dish
Carved from rock crystal, with the feet in gold,
And garnets round the rim; but the boy slipped
Against the tent rope, and the precious dish
Broke into shards of beauty on the ground,
Scalding the son of Ali. One guest cried:
"Dog! wert thou mine, for this this thing thou should'st howl!"
Another, "Wretch! thou meritest to die?"
And yet another, "Hassan, give me leave
To smite away this swine's head with my sword!"
Even Hassan's self was moved; but the boy fell
Face to the earth, and cried, "My lord, 'tis writ,
'Paradise is for them that check their wrath!'"
"'Tis writ so," Hassan said; "I am not wroth."
"My lord," the boy sobbed on, "also 'tis writ,
'Pardon the trespasser.'" Hassan replied:
"'Tis written—I remember—I forgive."
"Now is the blessing of the most high God
On thee, dear master!" cried the happy slave,
"For he—'tis writ—'loves the beneficent.'"
"Yea! I remember, and I thank thee, slave,"
Quoth Hassan; better is one noble verse
Fetched from 'the Book' than gold and crystal brought
From Yaman's hills. Lords, he hath marred the dish,
But mended fault with wisdom. See, my slave!
I give thee freedom, and this purse to buy
The robe and turban of a Moslem freed."

MONSIEUR, MY HUSBAND.

"And you mean to tell me my brother proposes to marry Marie to a Prussian?" Mlle. Archaimbault, the sister of the well-known Strasburg banker, was for once roused from her ordinary well-bred calm. She spoke shrilly, and her dark eyes sparkled with rage.

"I do," said the ugly little abbe, the great friend of the family, and confessor to Marie Archimbault and that beloved twin-brother, Alphonse who was killed in the late Franco-German war. The abbe and Mlle. Archaimbault (who kept house for her widowed brother, now absent for the moment in Paris) were seated in the magnificent drawing room of the Hotel Archaimbault in Strasburg.

"Impossible—preposterous! Marie,—the best match in the town,—who might marry a vicomte at the very least," and the aunt glanced complacently around at the tapestried walls, the heavy amber satin draperies, the massive gilt furniture and marqueterie cabinets arrayed as primly as the garden outside, where avenues, cut straightly as if by some sharp giant knife, ended in a statue or a fountain. "Marie—to marry a Prussian! My brother must be mad, or you"—turning sharply to the abbe—"are jesting."

"I never felt less inclined to do so, mademoiselle." And, indeed, the abbe's wrinkled leather face was twisted into an expression of grave perplexity as he leaned his elbows on his knees, loosely clasping his thin hands, and staring vaguely at the huge rose bouquets on the Aubusson carpet. He understood the letter he had that morning received from his friend, the banker, well. It was dated Paris, and commissioned the abbe to break the news of his consent to the pretensions for Marie's hand of a young German officer, the son of a Berlin millionaire. This the abbe, who had been partially in M. Archaimbault's confidence, took to mean that the recent alarming failure of certain great Parisian bankers had so far imperilled the Strasburg house that failure would only be averted by this marriage. For Marie's dot had been a temporary stop-gap, and the young German was more than ready to marry her without it; in fact, to make any arrangements M. Archaimbault pleased.

But the abbe did not understand the banker's postscript, which assumed Marie's consent, and announced the arrival of M. le pretendu as immediate. "He wishes to have his first interview with Marie alone," wrote M. Archaimbault. "Request my sister that it may be."

It was necessary for the abbe to break the ice. The roses on the carpet did not help him. At last he blurted out:

"This gentleman arrives to-day."

"Let him arrive." Mlle. Archaimbault leaned back in her chair, folded her arms lightly across her bosom, and looked—in the neat black dress she was still wearing as mourning, not only for the young nephew 'murdered by the Prussians,' but for captured, subdued, enslaved Strasburg—as grim and forbidding as a prison portcullis. "Let him arrive. He will not see me."

"No," said the abbe quaintly. "Your brother desires that he shall see Marie alone."

No shell thrown into the beautiful city when beleaguered by her victorious foes could have produced a sharper effect. Mlle. Archaimbault gasped, paled, choked; took up her fan, then dropped it, and burst into tears.

"That is all right," thought the abbe, cheerfully. "When once they begin to cry, they give in." Then he gave her time to "have her cry out," and, walking to the window, gazed out where the town lay spread out around the proud cathedral, whose lofty spire seemed still stretching skyward—the beloved city, now all patches and props like some wounded human being. But mademoiselle wept on, and he came back into the stately room, thinking how much more unpleasant this was than his usual experiences of the hotel; the evenings spent playing piquet with M. Archaimbault, and teaching the fair, beautiful Marie English. Latterly there had been more English and less piquet; for the banker, after losing game after game through inadvertence, would get up and go to his own room, and the abbe, after taking a few thoughtful pinches of snuff, would put away the cards and join Marie where she sat at work in the corner with her aunt. They had nearly finished reading Ivanhoe; and to-day an unknown knight would appear. How little had they dreamed this!

"Do you not think it would be better to think how we shall break the news to Marie, instead of crying about it?" asked the abbe, gently. Then, as mademoiselle incoherently murmured something about "the shock," and being "totally unnerved," he rang a small silver handbell.

The yellow satin portieres were lifted, and as if by magic, a footman, in the fawn and crimson Archaimbault livery, with heavy silver shoulder-knot and loops, spotless stockings and freshly-powdered hair, stood there, awaiting his orders.

"Tell Mlle. Marie—" began the abbe; but the footman stepped aside with a respectful obeisance, and a young girl came in, dressed in white, with large bows of black ribbon. She was tall, fair, with serene blue eyes under arched brows, and a soft, white skin—more like the Belgian mother, who had died shortly after the birth of the twins, Marie and Alphonse, than like the French father and aunt, dark, wiry and determined. Perhaps the beautiful girl's most potent charm was her graceful throat and neck, which deserved the epithet of "swan-like" anciently bestowed upon the celebrated Matilda of Flanders. "Good morning," she began pleasantly. Marie was always glad to see the good-natured, monkey-like face of the abbe, with those stray wisps of hair which never would keep in the right place across his bald head. Then her welcoming expression changed to one of consternation. "Ma tante!"—and she went quickly to her, kneeling down and exclaiming, "Papa?"

"Is perfectly well," said the abbe drily, "your aunt has been crying—about you."

"About—me?" Marie looked perplexed.

"Yes. You have received a proposal of marriage."

The aunt clasped her niece's hands and averted her eyes. A smile flitted across Marie's face—amused, incredulous—as a stray sunbeam flickers upon a wintry landscape. She had rarely smiled since her twin brother's death. "But, mon pere, there is no one," she said. Indeed they had led secluded lives since the war—since their terrible loss—at the Hotel Archaimbault.

The abbe cleared his throat. "Yes, there is," he began.

"Do not tell her. I cannot bear it. It is an insult," muttered her aunt.

Marie glanced quickly from one to the other, then she compressed her lips. "Please tell me at once," she said firmly. "Whatever it is, I can bear it. I have known grief."

"I have had a letter from your father this morning, in which he desires me to inform you that he approves of a proposal made for the honor of an alliance with you to a young German."

The abbe repressed the contemptuous term "Prussian" out of respect for the approved aspirant. Still, so strong was the Strasburgian hatred of their present rulers, that he felt ashamed when he disclosed the intelligence, and could not bring himself to look Marie in the face. Therefore neither he nor Mlle. Archaimbault, who sat, the image of despair, gazing into vacancy, saw the beautiful blush, the drop of the eyes, the happy smile that dwelt one moment upon the young girl's face—one moment, for it was only a memory. Still, the memory softened the "Oh!" with which she greeted the announcement.

"You perceive we have not quite killed her with our intelligence," remarked the abbe to the aunt, somewhat satirically.

"The idea is too preposterous for her to realize," replied the lady, indignantly.

"What!—That a German wishes to marry me? Does my father desire the alliance, mon pere?"

"I am afraid—I think he does, ma fille."

"What is this man—this German—like?"

"Well," the abbe paused, thinking pitifully of the natural curiosity of these daughters of Eve, a curiosity so strong that it seemed to smother their holiest natural impulses—"he is, I suppose, tall"—throwing up his arm—"strong"—inflating his chest—"fierce"—rolling his little eyes—"with a great moustache, red, red as fire."

"No, no, not red—fair!" cried Marie. Then, as her aunt and her confessor stared in astonishment, her head drooped, and a blush mantled even her fair throat with a tinge of pink.

"And he is an—officer." "(At least this will arouse her natural animosity toward her brother's slayer," thought the abbe, himself growing almost annoyed by Marie's unnatural demeanor.)

Marie was silent.

"And his name," continued the abbe, almost sternly, "is Karl Eichmann."

"Cruel! You have killed her!" cried the aunt, terrified. Marie had risen to her feet, and, holding her hands to her breast, had staggered away. She leaned against the wall, her eyes closed, pale with the ghastly pallor of a corpse.

"What have I done? Mon Dieu! What have I done?" exclaimed the poor little abbe, wringing his hands. "I can assure you, mademoiselle—my good child, I had no idea—how was I to imagine—"

"You have done nothing," said Marie, solemnly, opening her eyes. "How could you know? Mon pere—that name was said to me—by my dear brother—the moment before—he died."

An instant's silence. Then the abbe murmured: "This is, indeed, a mystery."

"A most horrible mystery!" sobbed Mlle. Archaimbault. "It is the worst day of my life."

"Compose yourself, my child," said the abbe, hastily. A servant entered, and presented a card to Marie on a gilt salver.

"It is Herr Karl Eichmann," said the young girl. "Ask Herr Eichmann into the anteroom," she said calmly to the servant; "and when I ring the bell, bring him in."

The footman bowed and retired.

"You, my aunt, and you, mon pere, had better await us there" (pointing to an adjoining room.) "and when you hear me ring this bell twice you will come to me."

"She is right," said the abbe consolingly, offering his arm to Mlle. Archaimbault. And feeling half stunned, he hardly knew why, he led the trembling, weeping woman into the adjoining boudoir.

After Marie had carefully closed the big doors upon them and had arranged the portiere, she made a violent effort to compose herself for the coming interview. "Mon Dieu! what can it mean?" she first said, wildly pushing back her hair from her burning forehead. How well she remembered the events of that awful day, when her twin brother—almost one with herself—her beloved Alphonse—died! He had been brought home to them, dying slowly of some injury to the spine, shortly after the capitulation, and they had endured the slow agony of watching him lie insensible day after day, hour after hour. That cruel time, when Strasburg lay fettered, the enemy's strong foot upon her neck, dearer than ever to her children in her slavery! Each man, woman and child seemed to bear one link of her heavy chain around their hearts like a crown of thorns, while they silently scorned and shunned their conquerors, and caressed their lost nationality in secret. In mourning garb they thronged the churches, creeping thither through streets where they would be least offended by the sight of those "accursed Prussians." And while the market-place was gay, the restaurants full of bright uniforms, the military bands clashing out the latest German waltzes and quick-marches, not one citizen of Strasburg could be seen there. They were abasing themselves before the altars, and the little chapel of Our Lady of Sorrows in the cathedral was full of sad kneeling figures from early morning till late night. Here Marie came, here she fled in her anguish, when the doctor told her Alphonse's life was now an affair of hours. It was evening; while the flickering of the many votive tapers played upon the sad beautiful face of the Mater Dolorosa in the great picture above her altar, casting strange new expressions across the pained features, the kneeling crowd were in shadow. Marie could faintly distinguish the outline of the Pieta in the corner of the chapel—the great image of Mary with the dead Christ in her lap. She wept and prayed; and was rising to return to her watch beside the death-bed, when she saw a face gazing in upon her through an aperture in the screen that divided the chapel from the cathedral nave. A man's face, soft, tender; the eyes fixed upon her with such pity, such deep, yearning love, that instinctively she moved a step forward. Then she remembered, recoiled, and the face vanished. Was it a comforting vision? Some strange influence had passed into her soul; a promise of consolation. Calmed, wondering, she went through the darkness and out into the moonlight, unaware of a quick step that followed, till, the door shut behind her, a voice said pleadingly, "Mademoiselle!"

She started—turned. Heavens! She was face to face with a tall officer; the moonlight gleamed on the silver facings of his light blue uniform.

"Monsieur!" she cried, with passionate anger. Then, drawing herself up, she flashed one glance of hatred upon him and fled.

That night Alphonse opened his eyes; he was conscious, he smiled upon them. Bending over him she had heard him say those two words, "Karl Eichmann," then he sighed, and his spirit went.

All these things came back to her as she stood irresolute, looking at the card inscribed with tha name. At last she nerved herself and rang the bell.

"Herr Karl Eichmann." Quick footsteps crossed the floor, spurs clanked, and a tall figure was there. She stood, her eyes fixed on the floor.

"Mademoiselle!"

"Ah!" A shiver, a shuddering sigh; all color left Marie's cheek; her lips trembled. This was the man in the pale blue uniform, and his face was the face she saw that night in the cathedral. Bewildered, she shrank back and stammered:

"Sir, there is some mistake. I expected Herr Lieutenant Karl Eichmann."

He smiled. His large blue eyes looked benignant, though his huge moustache lent fierceness to his face.

"I am he," he said.

"You—but you—you spoke to me—and my brother—"

"Did your brother tell you about me?" he eagerly asked.

"Monsieur, my brother is dead; but he once spoke that name to me."

"Then you do not know that it was I—that saw it—ah! let me tell you, mademoiselle," he cried, for Marie turned away; the sight of that hated uniform, the recollection of that night, sickened her. "Hear me! It is I that, fighting near to your brother, saw the fragments of a shell strike his horse—saw it rear and throw him. These arms lifted him and carried him from the field. Yes, mademoiselle, his head rested here" (he struck his shoulder); "and if it had not been for me you would never have seen him again alive. I was powerless to save his life, but at least I can lay claim to having prolonged it. Now, will you still turn away as if you would not bear to look at me?"

"You were my brother's enemy—perhaps—even—ah! I cannot bear the thought." She spoke in a hard, choked voice.

"Mademoiselle, I was his friend."

"How could you—a Prussian—be my brother's friend?" She turned upon him in anger; more with herself—for in spite of the fact that this man was a foe hated with a cherished hatred, the same curious influence affected her as in the cathedral. When she looked at that fine face with the frank large eyes and the bronzed, aquiline features, she was attracted, pleased, soothed.

"Why did you not tell me this, then, before?"

"If you remember, mademoiselle, I tried to speak to you, but you would not hear me."

"That was not the way, that was not the time."

"There I take leave to differ from you. I was determined that no one should hear the story of Alphonse's death-blow, except you, from my lips."

"Why?"

"Because, mademoiselle, I loved you." He spoke with passionate earnestness. She blushed violently.

"How could you do that monsieur, when you had never seen me?"

"If I tell you all, will you listen? Mademoiselle, Alphonse and I were friends in Paris, just before the war began. He was there, as you know, with his regiment—I to enjoy myself during my leave. How little we knew, when we used to talk of you, of the yawning gulf—the battlefield—that would shortly divide us."

"He spoke to you of me?" The tears welled into her eyes.

He drew a little velvet case from his breast, reverently kissed it, and held it toward her. "Perhaps you recognize this?"

"My portrait! The one I gave Alphonse." She was agitated. "Did he give it you? but no; how could he?"

"When I carried him into the tent after the fatal moment, he opened his eyes, recognized me, and, feeling feebly in his breast, drew out this, gave it me, and said one word—'Marie!' It was his last effort," added the young man with emotion, "before he fell into that unconscious state from which he never recovered. I understood that he wished me to place this in your hands."

"And—your name—was the last he said. What did he mean? Oh!" exclaimed the young girl, covering her face with her hands.

"He knew how much I thought of you—how I cared for him—how I had loved your portrait, mademoiselle. He was pleased, he would read me your letters—those sweet, innocent, girlish letters; he would have introduced me to you; but then came the fatal news—the declaration of war. Private friends became public foes."

"Does my father know this?" murmured Marie, behind the screen of her hands.

"No. He knew Alphonse was my friend. And he gave me permission to see you alone. Oh, Marie, listen to me. I have thought of you, felt for you, followed you at a distance watching over you, so long! I knew my only chance was to see you and plead my own cause. A just one," he added almost haughtily. "If these arms are not worthy to hold you—then may they be withered, paralyzed, as I stand here."

"Give me a minute to think," murmured Marie, sinking into a chair, and leaning her head wearily against the back. "Can you not wait—come again?"

"No, mademoiselle." The answer was sudden, fierce, like a shot. "I will either leave you at once, or remain."

There was silence. Marie, in miserable perplexity—bound to her prejudices, yet her beating heart, her inclination, belying them—tried to think. She thought of Alphonse. Once more she heard the feeble utterance—"Karl Eichmann." Her father, had he not actually sent him here? Then—a Prussian—that hated uniform! The more she reflected the more uncertain she grew.

Suddenly she sprang up. Decision was in her rallying color, her sparkling eyes, her whole demeanor.

"It is all over," thought the brave young soldier. His heart seemed to sink within him; he trembled like a girl; he turned to go; his head sank upon his breast.

The bell rang shrilly—once, twice.

Before the second peal was fairly over the doors of the boudoir opened abruptly, the portieres were pushed aside, and two scared, anxious faces looked in, the abbe's quaint, ugly face above that of Mlle. Archaimbault, who walked into the room, pale, stern, determined to uphold her niece's brave refusal of this hated Prussian, if need be, to the death.

"Monsieur!" Karl Eichmann started as Marie spoke, gently, tenderly; then, a soft hand stealing into his, he turned in astonishment to, find Marie smiling, almost beaming.

"Ma tante," said she, "and mon bon pere, allow me to introduce to you, Monsieur, my husband."

"Diable!" cried the abbe, startled into profanity.

"God protect us," said Mlle. Archaimbault, devoutly, crossing herself as a shield against Prussian witchcraft.

"You are both right," exclaimed the young man, first passionately kissing the fair hand that lay contentedly in his, then saluting them with a stiff military bow. "You, madame, and you, mon pere—the devil may begin wars, but it is the good God who ends them!"

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

Protection for Children.

The bitter, frosty weather which we have been having of late, interspersed with damp, raw days when the air would seem to strike a chill to the very vitals of all who were obliged to be out, is trying to the healthy and strong, particularly so for delicate people and children. Exposure in such weather very often causes serious illness and increases the tendency to diphtheria, scarlet fever and croup. Children and old people have less vital heat than persons in middle life and therefore feel the cold much sooner. They should be warmly and sensibly clothed, so what they have may be carefully hoarded. The clothing which they wear does not furnish warmth, but prevents the dissipation of the heat which already exists. Woolens are poorer conductors of heat than cottons or linens, and so are said to be warmer. For this reason they should be used for a covering of the whole body. Feet and ankles should be well protected. Thin soled shoes and light fancy woolen stockings or worse cotton ones are hardly sufficient to prevent these extremities from almost freezing when they come in contact with the outside atmosphere and icy stone pavements, and there is hardly any more sure way of taking cold than by going out in raw, wet weather with the feet and legs clad in such a manner. Girls, with their short dresses and skirts, and little boys in knickerbockers are, perhaps, clothed warmly about their bodies, but often their feet and legs are only covered with one or two thicknesses. Many such children are unaccountably delicate, but it never occurs to their mothers that they may be to blame for the croupy cough or disagreeable catarrhal affection brought on by their neglect or carelessness in this regard. For dress, a hat, perhaps, takes the place of the warm hood which has been worn through the week, and head and neck are exposed to the sharp, biting wind, making the poor little ears tingle, and causing them to ache for days and nights to come.

Thick, heavy soled shoes, long wooden underdrawers, warm stockings, leggins and overshoes, or better, arctics, are all necessary for the health and comfort of a child during the winter season in this climate. The hands and wrists also need to be kept warm, and it is simply cruel to leave off a close, woolen hood and substitute a head covering which will allow the cold wind to whistle through the ears and about the poor, unprotected neck. Really, there are children in our orphan asylums who are more warmly and comfortably clothed than some who dwell in elegant homes, surrounded by every luxury, where silks, linen cambrics and dainty garments—so dainty and delicate that there is no warmth or comfort in them—make up the wardrobes of the petted little ones.

A large supply of good common sense is what every mother of a family requires, whether she be rich or poor, it makes no difference. If she would have healthy, happy children, a pleasant home, and comfort all about her, she must never, under any circumstances, allow her stock to diminish. There are a thousand and one ways by which she can rid herself of it. Fashion makes large demands, and many a woman has been driven to her wits' end to meet them without losing to a great or less extent her stock of this valuable commodity. The desire to keep up appearances often gets the upper hand, and before she knows it she is nearly bankrupt and finds herself fretting and worrying over the trifling vanities which make an outward show and leaving the substantial necessaries which really make life comfortable and happy to take care of themselves. A fine bonnet or some expensive ornament, all right, if it could be afforded, takes the place of new warm flannels or needed kitchen furniture. Elaborate entertainments are allowed to make unwarranted drain upon the purse when simple ones would have been much more in keeping with the circumstances of the host. Oh, that every mother would hoard her stock of common sense. It matters not what position she holds in society, whether she own her millions, her cosey home or dwells in a rented cot, it will always be a resource to draw from which will aid to her comfort and happiness; a supply which will help to balance many a troublesome account and keep her safe from disaster.

The Amateur Carpenter.

Harper's Bazar: Nothing more surely devastating than a man with a fondness for amateur carpentry is ever found in a respectable household. The reckless inebriate who throws all of the furniture out of the window does perhaps an equal amount of injury, but he can not be said to be a feature of respectable households. There is an old proverb that is often repeated on the 1st of May to the effect that three movings are equal to one fire in point of destructiveness. It might be expanded by the addition of the great truth that one amateur carpenter is equal to two movings, and even then the destructiveness of home carpentry would be underrated. The husband of whom the infatuated wife is fond of remarking, "He is so handy with his tools that he can do almost anything," destroys an average amount of $75 worth of furniture annually, as estimated by our most intelligent furniture dealers; and so well is this understood among the latter class that some enterprising furniture dealers sell amateur tool chests at half their cost to their regular customers, feeling sure that their business will thereby be immensely benefited.

The amateur carpenter always has perfect confidence in himself, and instead of learning humility from his many failures, he grows bolder and more reckless. He may be too busy or too tired to accede to the ordinary requests of his wife, but when she asks him if he won't just mend the rocking chair or put a shelf in the kitchen, he will even lay aside his after-dinner cigar in his zeal to wield the hammer and saw. He rarely finishes what he undertakes to do. If there is what ladies call a "squeak" somewhere in the rocking chair, he begins the work of banishing the squeak by pulling the chair apart, and, when, after an hour or two of hard work, involving great destruction of veneering and hopeless laceration of the joints of the chair, he succeeds in disconnecting the rockers he announces that he is too tired to do any thing more, and must put off the work of reconstruction until the next day. In some cases he does resume work, and succeeds in putting the chair together again after a fashion, but it is then so scarred and maimed that he acknowledges that it will have to go to the cabinet makers to be "done over," and, in his pride at having removed the squeak, he never seems to perceive that the last state of that chair is decidedly worse than the first.

The partial or permanent ruin of the object which the amateur carpenter undertakes to mend is by no means the full extent of the damage which he inflicts upon the furniture. If he uses the saw he invariably places the article to be sawed on a chair, and contrives to inflict a deep cut on the chair by the zealous and incautious use of his weapon. If he wishes to nail one piece of wood to another, he places them on the floor, and drives his nails through the carpet and deep into the planks beneath. When he uses the glue-pot he either lays the wet brush down upon the damask table-cover or he upsets the glue upon the carpet. One of his most characteristic feats is that of shortening one leg of a table. Being told that the leg is too long, he saws it off, so as to make it of the same length as the other legs. Invariably he finds that he has made it too short, and he then tries to shorten the other legs. There is yet to be found a single instance of a successful shortening of table legs by a man with an amateur tool chest, although several exasperated and persevering men have sawed an entire set of four legs into small pieces in the vain hope of bringing them into uniformity.

It is probable that more far-reaching injury is done by the amateur carpenter who makes articles of furniture than by the man who simply repairs them. The book cases and single bedsteads made by the head of the family, who is handy with his saw, cannot be thrown out of doors, but must remain to vex the souls of the intelligent members of the family and fill the minds of visitors with amazement. What is imperatively needed is a strict prohibitory law forbidding the sale of carpenter's tools to any man who can not prove that he is a professional carpenter. Until this is done there will always be men who will buy tools, and enter upon a career of destruction of household furniture which must cause any angel with a taste for housekeeping to weep bitter though useless tears.

Household Hints.

An old black bunting dress may be made to serve a further period of usefulness by being renovated and made a petticoat. The dust shakes out of bunting with so little effort of the wearer that it continues to be popular year after year. Rip the dress up, select the best for cleaning, buy 5 cents' worth of soap bark at any drug store, let it stand in water until dissolved, if it is pulverized; if not, you will be obliged to let it soak, and then steep it for a few minutes. Put your bunting in enough lukewarm water to cover it, and turn the preparation in, rinse it up and down until the cloth is saturated with it; then rinse it in clear water, which should be lukewarm also. The effect upon the goods is remarkable; it cleanses and restores. Black goods of various kinds may be cleaned in the same way.

The Southern way of serving chicken with rice is recommended to Northern housewives as a most excellent dish. Joint a chicken and boil gently in a deep saucepan, with just water enough to cover the chicken. For one chicken allow half a pint of uncooked rice; boil this, and after the chicken is tender remove it from the pan and add the rice to the gravy. Season with pepper and salt. Many cooks add two small slices of bacon to the water in which the chicken is boiled, to help flavor the gravy; but remove the bacon before serving the gravy. When the gravy has boiled up, and after being thickened, as usual, take the rice out with a long-handled strainer, place it on a platter, and lay the chicken on the top. Send the gravy to the table in a gravy-boat.

Brown bread made by following these directions is sure to be good. Sift, until thoroughly mixed together, half a pint of flour, one pint of corn meal, half a pint of rye flour, one teaspoonful of salt, two teaspoonfuls of baking-powder, one tablespoonful of brown sugar. Peel, wash, and boil two medium-sized potatoes; rub them through a sieve, and beat them well with half a pint of water. Make a batter of this, and the meal, etc. Butter a deep basin, or small pan, and pour the batter in; then set the pan in a kettle of boiling water; let it cook in this way for an hour. Cover the pan, of course, and put it in a hot oven for half an hour.

For a large sponge cake, or for one which may be baked in two tins, use this formula: One pound and a quarter of sugar; beat fourteen eggs, the whites and yolks separate; then with the yolks beat the sugar and a little powdered mace; then beat in the whites of the eggs and sift the flour in through a colander. Beat this all thoroughly, and bake with an even heat until the cake begins to shrink away from the edges of the tin. If you wish to frost this cake, reserve three of the whites of the eggs for this purpose; but it is better "form" not to frost a sponge cake. Take pains with the baking, and the top of the cake will be much more pleasing to the eye than frosting can make it.

If baby catches cold and it settles in his head and makes his nose into a rattle-box, or, as grandmother says, "gives him the snuffles," you may ease the little sufferer and enable him to sleep peacefully by greasing his nose and the bit of forehead directly above his nose. For use at this time some animal oil is better than any that is manufactured. When chickens are cut up, before cooking save some of the fat, try it out, and put the oil thus obtained in a wide-mouthed bottle with a closely-fitting cork; keep in a cool closet. This oil is excellent for the purpose named.

A famous caterer says that a slight flavoring of onion improves most made dishes. Of course tastes differ in regard to this, but it is safe for a cook who is uncertain whether those she serves like it or not to omit it entirely, or use enough of the onion to give a pronounced flavor to the dish. I know of an otherwise faultless meal being spoiled for most of those who partook of it by their being uncertain whether a certain dish was intended to be flavored with this vegetable or whether it was a mistake.

Raisin pie, which is preferred by many people to grape pie, is made of one cup of crackers, rolled very fine, one cup of cold water, the juice and rind of one lemon, one cup of raisins, stoned and chopped very fine, and one heaping teacupful of sugar. Beat these thoroughly together, and add one egg the last thing. Bake with a thin upper and under crust; rub the top crust with the white of an egg or with a little milk with sugar dissolved in it; bake in a moderate oven, but brown the pie by setting it on the shelf in the oven.

A dish of oysters prepared in this way is very nice for tea: Toast some slices of bread until they are well browned on both sides. Butter them on both sides. Put the slices around the sides of a pudding dish. Then put a layer of oysters, well seasoned with butter, pepper, and salt, in the bottom, and cover it with bread crumbs, and so on until the dish is full. Pour over all a coffee cupful of hot water, or enough to moisten the bread and toast. Bake for three-quarters of an hour in a hot oven.

Chocolate ice cream, which is perfectly delicious, is made by taking two quarts of sweet cream (not milk), half a pint of milk, sugar enough to sweeten this, four eggs, and about one-third of a cake of chocolate grated; flavor the cream with vanilla before stirring in the chocolate; beat the cream until it is stiff, and then add the other ingredients. Freeze, stirring until it is so hard you can do so no longer; the more rapidly you stir it the finer grained the cream will be.

Here is a recipe for a delicious pudding sauce: Scald half a pint of sweet milk; while still in the saucepan, pour in the well-beaten yolks of two eggs; let this boil until about like custard; then let it cool, and when cool add the whites of two eggs beaten stiff, and a tablespoonful of vanilla. When beating the whites of the eggs, beat one teacupful of pulverized sugar in with them. When the eggs and sugar are added to the sauce, it should be stirred vigorously.

Tidies made of antique lace can be worked satisfactorily if soaked in borax water; then let them lie in warm suds, squeezing them with your hands, rinse, but do not blue them. Instead of ironing them, pull them in shape, and pin them to a clean cloth on your ironing board; pick out each little point and pin it down. Let them get perfectly dry before removing them.

An excellent soup can be made by taking one can of corn and boiling the corn in one quart of milk and water in equal proportion; season with salt, pepper and butter. After it has boiled for about ten minutes, stir in it three well-beaten eggs. Serve hot with a little rolled cracker added just before sending to the table.

The tidies, and table scarfs, and lambrequins crocheted of macreme or fish cord are very much improved in appearance if, after they are done, but before the ribbons are run in, they are pressed with a hot iron. Lay a damp cloth over the wrong side of the work, and press hard and dry with the iron.

Do not throw away woolen stockings, even if the feet are entirely worn out, or are so thin as to warrant no more wearing; the legs make the best kind of stockings for a child of two years old. Cut a pattern from a little "boughten" pair and make with small soft seams.

Sweet potatoes which are almost without taste are much improved if the tough outside skin is removed, and they are put under a roast of beef to cook. They will brown over nicely and receive an agreeable flavor.

For one who can afford to use it in that way, whipped cream, highly flavored with vanilla, rose water, or wine, makes the richest and most agreeable pudding sauce.

A handsome pincushion which can be used is made of satin with a spray of flowers embroidered in silk. Around the edge put a heavy plaiting of [illegible]

REST.

There is no rest. 'Tis but an empty sound—
A dream all shadowless the world around.
Unrest is normal. Every orb or ray,
Greater or less, that beams by night or day,
Sun, moon or star that burns through endless space,
Each in its course runs one eternal race.

God never rests—eternal vigil keeps;
The Eye All-Seeing slumbers not, nor sleeps.
All things obedient to one Lofty Soul,
Move ever restless as the ages roll.
Unrest is life—hope—action—glory—play;
Rest is but death—cessation is decay.

Unrest is real. The glorious Power that spanned
The mighty fabric of the skies and planned
The architectural glories, far and near,
That deck each world and ornament each sphere,
Is constant in its work supreme, sublime;
In restless glory through resistless time.

There is no rest in all the realms of life.
Man's an epitome of endless strife;
The heated words which drop from human tongues,
The breath that parts the lips and fills the lungs,
Each heart-throb, each pulsation, every thrill
Of joy or sorrow, leaves him restless still.

There is no rest, nor can rest e'er prevail;
The world's in motion—mountain, forest, vale;
The wondrous ocean's restless currents roll
Around the sea-washed world from pole to pole;
The cloud, the storm; the darkness and the light
Proclaim resistless force and restless might.

There may be peace: the world in stillness may,
And awful silence, pass the years away;
Long centuries hide in Time's eternal breast—
Peace, silence, stillness all—but never rest,
Rest is the mildew, the corroding rust,
Hope's faded ashes and Love's crumbling dust.

FOR RELIGIOUS REFLECTION.

Views Regarding Divorce.

Philadelphia Times: The Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix's outspoken views in his lecture in New York upon the subject of divorce are attracting a great deal of attention, especially in the theological world. Some of the representative clergymen of different denominations, who were interviewed upon the subject by a reporter yesterday, did not in every case indorse the eminent divine's opinions.

"It looks very much as if Dr. Dix is going to extremes," said the Rev. Thomas Magoon, of the Broad Street Baptist church. "I am very free to admit that divorces seem at least to be too frequent, while the responsibility and sanctity of the marriage relation is neither appreciated nor regarded as it should be. So impressed have I become with the degree of laxity in the observance of the divorce laws establishing and regulating humanity that it has made me cautious as to whom I may marry. Regarding Dr. Dix's assertion that the laxity of the divorce system in this country is 'an enormity of Protestantism,' I am constrained to admit that Protestants do frequently permit and commit some actions in this direction that would not be tolerated for a moment by either Jews or adhering Catholics. And yet I do not claim that the divorce law is altogether bad. People are sometimes bound together who have no business to be, and it is but justice and with a strong tinge of humanity that they be afforded some means of relief."

The Rev. O. H. Tiffany, pastor of the Arch Street Methodist Episcopal church, said:

I have not read anything concerning Dr. Dix's lectures upon the subject of divorce. Not long ago I preached a sermon in which I expounded the law. The system of divorce as it now exists is a crying sin.

The Rev. Charles G. Ames, pastor of the Unitarian church, at the corner of Broad and Spring Garden streets, said:

I do not believe that the cause for divorce should rest alone in adultery. When a man is faithless to a woman in other respects, such as habitual drunkenness, neglect or other seriously improper conduct, the woman should not be bound to him through eternity. Nor do I consider, as Dr. Dix claims, that all the evils resulting from the system of divorce are attributed entirely to Protestantism. Perhaps that should be put in a little different manner. No marriage is perfect without religion as its principal element. Marriage is a thing of divine law, but owing to the fact that it involves contract between the man and woman in the matter of the endowment of the wife by the husband with his worldly goods and obedience to the husband on the part of the wife, it is necessary that it should also have the sanction of the law. A marriage contract before a justice of the peace or other civil authority is as holy and binding as a marriage solemnized by a minister, excepting in the visible acknowledgement in the latter case of the sanctity of the relation the contracting parties enter into.

The Rev. Dr. Ignatius F. Horstmann, pastor of St. Mary's Roman Catholic church, said Dr. Dix was right in all that he had read of his lectures. "I have not seen all that he has said, however," continued the speaker.

He is orthodox. There is one thing Protestants are mistaken about. The Catholic church does not sanction divorces because of adultery. Never. That was forever settled at the council of Trent. In case of adultery they may live apart, but that only applies to bed and board. But for a man to put one woman aside and marry another—never! England was lost to the church because she would not allow Henry VIII. to marry Anne Boleyn. Her troubles with Philip the Fair, of France, Frederick Barbarossa of Germany, and numbers of others all had their source in the inviolable law of God and His church—"Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." The Roman Catholic church never forsook a woman, and never will. In a word, marriage is absolutely indissoluble.

Joseph Cook on Suffrage.

In the prelude to his last lecture Joseph Cook gave some strong arguments in favor of limited female suffrage, such as is permitted now in many States:

This is a cause, he said, in which the whole world is interested. I have looked on this subject from the other side of the sea, and in speaking of it here, I have in mind Melbourne, Sydney, Calcutta, Bombay, Paris and London, and the multitude of municipalities which are drifting into the same dangers which threaten our great cities. The right management of great towns will be an absorbing question as suffrage broadens into the twentieth century. Let America remember that on this topic her responsibilities are worldwide. In view of the growth of representative institutions on the earth, in view of the massing of men in cities, in view of the general elevation of women's condition in Asia, in view of her enlarging industrial and educational and legal rights in Europe and America, who dares predict that a century hence there will not be something in our immensely misgoverned cities like limited municipal suffrage for women? I believe that this reform is coming, and that it will come to stay. God grant that our fashionable society may have the wisdom to ride in the chariot, and not be dragged behind its wheels.

The New Bishop of Indiana.

Rev. Isaac L. Nicholson, of St. Mark's church, Philadelphia, who has just been elected bishop of Indiana, is a prayer book churchman, without any ritualistic tendencies. St. Mark's church is one of the leading Episcopal churches in Philadelphia. By a charter provision morning and evening service is held every day in the year. The key of the door is never turned against the public except at night. Any person can enter the church at any hour of the day for private meditation and prayer as well as for public worship. The membership is so large that holy communion is celebrated at 7, 8, and 9 o'clock every Sunday morning, upon every Thursday, and upon all of the Saint days. In addition to the worship of St. Mark's, its charities are extraordinary. It maintains a hospital for the sick, and numerous guilds among the men and women for the poor and needy, and for missionary work at home and abroad. Dr. Nicholson superintends all these parochial charities in person. He has four clerical assistants to attend to the daily services and to aid in ministering to the sick and sorrowing members of the flock.

Droppings from the Sanctuary.

To-day the ground is cold, and hard, and bare,
A scarce is seen a tender blade of grass;
The trees show leafless branches as you pass,
And flowers lie withered in the frosty air.
But, somehow, nature seems to be aware
'Tis time for spring, and dimly, as in glass,
The practiced eye discerns a varied mass
That for glad springtime hastens to prepare.
So when the winter of our lives has sped,
And we are longing for eternal spring,
A thousand gentle influences are shed,
And wafted toward us as on angel's wing,
To fit us for the land where dwell the dead
After their days of early blossoming.

Pope Leo XIII. recently gave audience to a commission charged by the archbishop of Mexico, two other archbishops and a bishop of that country to present to his holiness a large sum of money, collected in their dioceses for Peter's pence. In thanking them for their offering, he expressed his regret that he could not yet establish diplomatic ties with so important a part of Catholicism. He knew what profound piety existed in Mexico, and felt sure that its rulers, even in their own interests, would not fail to renew those cordial relations with the holy see which had been interrupted by exceptional circumstances.

The Rev. Dr. J. M. Scudder of Vellore, India, wishes that every missionary in that land were a medical man, and urges the home societies not to send out any workers who have not, at least, a slight knowledge of medicine. He visited two towns for several years in succession without gaining the least hold, apparently, upon the people, when a slight surgical service on his part opened both their hearts and homes. It also opened his eyes to the value of medical knowledge.

Bishops Elder of Cincinnati and Gross of Savannah denounce the compositions of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and others as being "too gay and boisterous" for the solemnity of church services. The Gregorian music is being substituted by the St. Cecilia societies of Philadelphia and New York. This style of music is now used in St. Stephen's, St. Francis Xavier's, the Holy Innocents, St. Cecilia's and other Catholic churches in New York.

A Methodist minister of note says: "I have known hundreds of men and women who made no pretensions to [illegible] who sought no 'higher life,' who, in fact, were just as pure, true and holy in life and conversation as the best so-called 'holiness people' I ever saw, and not half so troublesome in the church."

Day begins at sunset with the Jews, Athenians, Mohammedans, Italians, Austrians and Bohemians; at sunrise with the Babylonians, Syrians, Persians, and modern Greeks; and at noon with ancient Egyptians and modern astronomers, and at midnight with the English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spaniards, Portuguese and Americans.

The Presbyterian church of England has entered upon the work of raising £25,000 in the next five years as a fund for aid in church building. The chairman of the meeting at which the scheme was unfolded, Mr. George Duncan, began the work in an excellent, practical way by subscribing £1,000.

The ancient church of Birdbrook, England, contains a monumental slab bearing the extraordinary record: "Martha Blewitt of Swann Inn, at Baythorne End, in this parish, buried May 7, 1681. She was the wife of nine husbands, consecutively, but the ninth outlived her."

Ten years ago a young man went from a little town in Maine to learn a trade in Boston. He subsequently studied theology and became a preacher, and is now pastor of the famous Old South church, Boston, at a salary of $8,000 a year.

A new Catholic cathedral, costing from $300,000 to $400,000, is to be built at Albany. A suitable plat of ground has already been secured and paid for, and $41,000 has been subscribed to begin work.

It is said that the Rev. James Freeman Clarke has prepared a condensed Bible for use in the home, the school, and the church, and that it will soon be issued by a New York publisher.

The Rt. Rev. H. Pinckney Northrop was installed last Sunday as bishop of the Roman Catholic diocese of Charleston, S. C.

The Rev. J. B. Hamilton of Rhode Island has given alcohol a new name. He calls it "aqua mortis"—the water of death.

Dr. Maclagan says, with the fervor of a true Scot, that "the Anglican church will prove herself to be the true salvation army."

This is the season of Methodist conferences, many of which are being held in various parts of the country.

Father Richter, the new bishop of Grand Rapids Mich., is only thirty-six years old.

EASTER MORNING.

The fasts are done; the Aves said,
The moon has filled her horn;
And in the solemn night I watch
Before the Easter morn.
So pure, so still the starry heaven,
So hushed the brooding air,
I could hear the sweep of an angel's wings
If one should earthward fare;—
Great Michael with his flaming sword,
Sandalphon bearing to the Lord
Some heart-cry of despair.

Now days are bright, and woods and fields
Thrill to the kiss of spring;
The plover calls across the marsh,
The mated robins sing;
And in all the summer gardens
No fairer flowers will twine
Than the shy arbutus yester eve,
I found beneath the pine,—
A censer every blushing cup
Whose breath of Eden floating up
Made the lone dell a shrine.

Alas, for April song and bloom!
My eyes are dim with tears
As I think of the dead no spring will wake
Through all the circling years!
With broken hearts we laid them down;
We followed them with prayers;
And warm and true for aye we keep
Our love and trust with theirs;
But silence shrouds them evermore,
Nor sun, nor star, nor sea, nor shore,
A pitying message bears.

Oh for a rift in the arching heaven!
A gleam of the jasper walls!
A single note of the holy hymn
That ceaseless swells and falls!—
Their graves are cold, and they never come
When the evening sun is low,
Nor sit with us one happy hour
In the firelight's fading glow;—
And I dream till my eyes are dim with tears,
And all my life o'erpowered with fears,
As the night-watches go.

Hark! 'tis the west wind blowing free,
Swift herald of the dawn;
Faint murmurs answer from the wood:
The night will soon be gone.
Sad soul! shall day from darkness rise,
And the rose unfold from the sod,
And the bare, brown hills grow beautiful
When May their slopes has trod,—
While they for whom the sun shone fair,
And rose and bird rejoiced the air,
Sleep on, forgot of God?

Depart, drear visions of the night!
We are the dead not they!
Through nobler worlds, with larger life,
They hold their blissful way.
Look out! The sky is flushed with gold.
In glad, celestial warning;
The purple clouds are backward rolled
And, gloom and shadows scorning,
O'er grief and death victorious,
Above all glories glorious,
Comes up the Easter morning!

FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

Easter in Russia.

According to the popular belief in Russia, the time from Christmas to ascensiontide is the most propitious of the whole year. All kinds of hidden treasures may be found during this season. On the "holy evenings" the infant Savior comes down from heaven and walks abroad on the earth with unwearied feet, blessing the round globe and fertilizing a hundredfold the spots on which His sacred feet have paused for any length of time. At this season no beggar nor any animal is refused food, from a fear that the infant Savior may test the peasant's hospitality by assuming some of the manifold forms of the life around them—an old relic of the ancient belief in the transfiguration of human souls into those of animals. Another curious custom by which the Russian peasants symbolize the idea that the new year brings to each man his allotted portion of good and evil is observed in Northern Russia. On the evening before the first of March two youths, one of whom is dressed in holiday attire, with a wreath round his hat made of dried ears of rye, and the other in a ragged dress made of straw, are covered with white veils, which entirely conceal their persons, and led from house to house. When they come to a cottage the Znakharka, or witch, who is principal in those celebrations, knocks at the door and tells the father of the family to choose one of the veiled figures. If his choice falls upon the well-dressed youth, the wise woman breaks forth into joyous song, and prophesies a good harvest and plenty of money for the householder; if it falls on the youth dressed in straw, she warns the father of the family to prepare for poverty and misfortune. The Butter Week, or Maslyanitsa, answers to the carnival of Western Europe. In some parts of Russia this festival is held with great pomp and ceremony. A fine sledge is built for the purpose and gaily painted; it is drawn by twelve horses. Innumerable other sledges containing singers and musicians, followed by the villagers, gaily dressed, attend the principal sledge, upon which is placed a round pillar painted red. Upon the pillar again is a wheel, colored yellow, and upon the wheel a peasant, fantastically dressed. He wears a comical silver paper cap, strung with small bells; in his hands are a loaf of rye bread and a bottle of vodki, or spirits. The sledge, horses and rider represent the sun and the months of the revolving year. It is driven all over the fields and meadows from sunrise to sunset, accompanied by music, dance and song.

In many parts of Russia the peasants have a calendar of their own quite distinct from that of the church and state. On the 1st of March, for instance, the "baibak," or marmot of the steppes, awakes from its long sleep of winter; it creeps out of its mudhole and begins to utter its peculiar whistling cry; on the 4th the rooks and crows return; on the 9th the larks come back, and on the 17th the ice on the rivers becomes so old and decayed that a pike can send its tail through it. On the 25th—a most holy and mysterious day—the swallows come back. Every peasant believes that these swallows are the disembodied spirits of children who have died without baptism. On the 5th of April the crickets bestir themselves, and on the 12th the great bear comes crawling out of his snow cave, where he has slept the winter away. And above all, the return of the cuckoo, the bird of God, the Virgin's bird, whose early coming foretells an abundant harvest, is hailed with peculiar joy and pleasure, and is celebrated with a very singular custom of antiquity. This festival is generally held on the Monday before Easter Sunday. The village women and all the young girls assemble at some spot in the nearest wood, where they dig little graves and bury a figure of a cuckoo made of faded flowers of the past summer. Over this they plant a cross, which they cover with bits of rags from some old garment worn by the wise woman, or witch of the village. They then join the young trees into arches over these crosses. Next day the villagers, young and old, meet at this spot. The girls are selected one by one. Each has her eyes blindfolded, and she sits on one of the branches of the trees under the arch, near the spot where the figure of the cuckoo was buried the day before. The young men join hands and dance around her, each in turn taking her hand and singing "Come—Queen Cuckoo, guess am I thy lover or not?" The blindfold maiden guesses which it is, and another girl [illegible] been most favored in the dance repair to the woods alone, to hear the prophetic cries of the cuckoo. The length of time each will have to wait before she is married to him she loves, is believed to be made known to each by the number of cries which she hears at this eventful moment. If two cries succeed each other, quickly, she will be married in the spring; if four, in the summer. If, on the contrary, no cuckoo is heard by her then and there, her lover will die before they are married, and the poor young girl is plunged in deepest grief. So absolute is the people's faith in these voices of universal nature, that girls who are convinced of the sad fate in store for their lovers, often leave their village homes and repair to the great cities, where they become nuns and devote themselves to the service of God. But all these Pagan customs are overshadowed by Easter week, which is celebrated with all possible grandeur in all the cities, great and small, of the Russias, and especially in Moscow.

FACTS FOR THE FARMERS.

Thick or Thin Seeding of Wheat.

RICHMOND, Walsh County, Dak., March 15.—To the Agricultural Editor: I often see articles written on thick or thin seeding of wheat. I have been an observer of the same for some fifteen years in Minnesota, and have concluded from observations and experiments that it is safer to sow one and a half bushels to the acre than more or less, especially in Minnesota. If there is plenty of rain and cool weather at the time wheat is stooling, one bushel, and perhaps less, is plenty for an acre, but if it should be dry at the time of stooling, then one and three-fourth bushels is none too much. I knew a farmer in Rice county that saved one peck per acre on part of his field, and raised five bushels more per acre than on the remainder of his field, where he sowed one and one-half bushels. The following season he sowed his one peck per acre on all his field. It was a dry spring, and he did not harvest his wheat that fall; he raised a crop of weeds, while his neighbors harvested some twenty bushels per acre. I have sowed 1½, 1¾ and 2 bushels per acre in the same field (same year) for experiment, and when we had wet weather when stooling, the thin seeding was best; but if dry weather, then two bushels was much the best; and as the farmer has to take his risk on the weather, I think one and one-half bushels is the safest. In 1881, my first season in the famous Red River valley, the farmers sowed from five to six pecks per acre. The five pecks were the best, averaging thirty to thirty-five bushels, while the heavier seeding averaged from twenty-five to thirty bushels per acre. Last season I sowed part of a field five pecks that went twenty-four and a half bushels; the remainder of the field I sowed seven pecks that went thirty bushels, and on old ground light seeding was very much less than heavy seeding. We had no rain from the commencement of seeding until June 20; then wheat was done stooling. So in dry seasons wheat stools but little; in wet seasons it stools much. So I think it much safer not to take either extreme, but one year after another I would rather risk one and a half bushels per acre than more or less. P.

ANOTHER OPINION ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

ST. PETER, March 12.—To the Agricultural Editor: An article in the WEEKLY PIONEER PRESS of March 1 on thick sowing of wheat contains opinions in favor of thin sowing, and requests readers who have opposite opinions to express them. Having experimented some in that line, I will give my conclusions. It must be supposed that this applies to wheat raising in general, as it is carried on upon large farms, where the highest state of cultivation is not used. I have sowed quantities varying from one bushel to two bushels per acre through a series of years, and have concluded that one and one-half bushels is nearest the proper quantity for all kinds of soil and one season with another. In soils that are very rich and clean I do not doubt but that one bushel of seed will be found quite sufficient. But rich soil is liable to become weedy, and there must be enough seed to choke them out and keep them back until the wheat begins to stool. Wheat in our common soils will send out fewer stalks than on the rich, and must have a sufficient thickness to shade the ground until the heads shoot up; for, if too thin, the straw and heads will both be stunted in their growth. It is often the case that in a wet season a fair piece of ground sowed with one bushel or one and one-quarter bushels will bring a satisfactory crop; but the same ground and seed would in a dry, hot season be too thin. We must try to use that quantity of seed that is the surest to produce a good crop in all kinds of seasons. Then again, spring plowing will take more seed than early fall plowing, as it does not stool so much on such plowing. I would generally sow from a peck to a half bushel more than on early fall plowing. My experiments have been on an ample scale and have cost me considerable, and I shall not go back to thin sowing on ordinary ground. I would say in conclusion that I think a drill will use a peck less seed to the acre than the broadcast. A NORTH, JR.

AND STILL ANOTHER.

PRESTON, Minn., March 13.—To the Agricultural Editor: Thick or thin seeding depends largely on the quality and condition the soil is in. If it has been cropped for ten or fifteen years in wheat, without manuring, or summer fallowing, or the turning under of green crops of any kind, or without the use of salt, or ashes or lime, it will need more seed than if the land has been kept up. I can prove that three pecks to one bushel of clean seed is plenty on good, rich, clean soil; but, on the other hand, if the land is run out through bad management and continued cropping, it will take more seed to an acre, because there is nothing for the plant to feed upon and it will only throw out one stalk instead of a number and that poor and short when harvest comes. Consequently, it will require double the amount of seed in order to get the same number of stalks to the field.

When your ground is in good order to raise wheat, one kernel will produce a great many stalks in starting. I will try and make as plain as I can the way I grow wheat. In the first place I keep my land in the best condition to raise wheat, if that is to be my crop. When the time comes for seeding, and the land is dry, I drag my ground the way I plow it in the fall. Then I cross-drag that, making twice before seeding. Let me say here if I have a piece of land that is very rich I drag it in the fall after plowing, so as to get the ground solid, for the solider the better. After I have my land well dragged in the spring I sow three pecks of clean seed wheat to an acre. I sow it with a broadcast seed sower that works the ground well. I have, at the same time, another team which drags behind my seed, and they make as many rounds as I do. By that time the ground is in fair shape to grow wheat. If it is not, I cross that once more with the drag. That is all that is necessary to raise wheat, and good results will follow. I had in eighty acres of wheat last season that went twenty-eight and a half bushels per acre, and testing fifty-nine pounds to the bushel, when some of my neighbors raised but eight and ten bushels per acre, testing from fifty-two to fifty-five pounds to the bushel. Neighbor "H" came over to my place last week. Said he: "John, how in the world do you raise such crops as you do? You raise more wheat from eighty acres of land than this whole neighborhood, and much better wheat than ours." I replied: "You have the same opportunity as I. In the first place, you are not trying to raise wheat, but you are trying to let it raise itself." "How is that?" said he. "In the first place," said I, "how much wheat do you sow to an acre?" "Well, on an average I sow one and three-fourths bushels; sometimes I sow two bushels." "What is your reason for doing so?" "Well, in the first place, I never can get my wheat to stand thick enough on the ground. I was thinking of sowing thicker this spring than ever, and if it's a dry season my wheat will stand about right; and if it is a wet season it will be a little thick. But my wheat kernels will be smaller and more of them, and I will have the same number of bushels, though there will be two kernels for one—that will be all the difference." "Well," said I, "that will do. I don't want any more of your wheat raising; let us talk about politics." Reader, you can imagine when it requires two bushels of seed or more to an acre to get a thick enough stand what shape the land is in. It will take a good many years to get that land in shape to raise wheat for a profit.

JOHN ANSTETT.

The New Way of Raising Potatoes.

A correspondent of the New York World is very jubilant over the improved methods now in use for growing potatoes:

"Planting, tilling and harvesting," he says, "can be done better, cheaper and faster per acre or bushel than by the old methods of twenty or forty years ago. By the old way a man with a hoe could dig the hills to put the seed in at the rate of an acre a day and it would take a man another day after the pieces were dropped to cover the acre. But by the new way, with a marking machine and team, a man will ride at his ease and mark the drills in rows both ways and at a desired width and depth at the rate of twenty-five acres a day; then, after dropping the seed, with the team and machine to cover a row at a time, six acres a day can be covered, or with a double machine two or twelve acres a day. Then, for tilling, instead of very rude and primitive cultivating and hand hoeing all the tilling is now done with horses and improved tools, and is done often enough to insure good, clean tillage, and twelve acres a day of better work can be done than half an acre was formerly done by hand. It requires about four men to dig an acre a day by hand, but with these new potato diggers a man with a team can run out his five or six acres a day and do it better, where the conditions are good for working, showing a gain of 100 or 200 per cent in favor of the modern improved methods. In farming this crop the farmer is not obliged to possess himself of a number of expensive tools for the different branches of its work, the marking out and covering and tillage through the season and the digging can all be done with different attachments of one combined machine, with two horses, the driver riding and doing two rows at a time, but for covering and digging only one row is done at a time. All the implements required for potato culture being thus combined in one, the expense is reduced—for the producer has not so many different implements to keep housed. The particular advantages of this machine, compared with most other tools for this class of work, are: It will do more perfect marking or furrowing out at any desired depth and gain; it is a very efficient tool as a coverer; it will cultivate or shovel-plough better, two rows at a time and guiding itself, than a man is able to do a single row with the single cultivator in common use, and the rows will be tilled clean and well. Then it can dig better and more in a day than twenty men can by hand. As this combined implement has now been employed by practical growers, who find that the [illegible]

The reciprocity treaty with Mexico went over among the unfinished business of the Senate, but will be taken up at the next session of Congress with a good prospect of ratification. It is considered eminently favorable to the United States, as it will greatly enlarge the market for our manufactures.

A bill looking toward the preservation of Niagara Falls and surroundings by the state has passed the New York Legislature by a close vote. It provides for the appointment of a commission to appraise the property necessary to cover the approaches to the falls and to furnish a park. The estimate cost of the purchase and improvements is $1,000,000.

Three members of the commission appointed by the government of Holland to investigate the trichinæ in American pork were young ladies, "who have given most satisfactory results of their ability in using the microscope and in detecting trichinæ." Thirty-three out of the 1,800 samples of American pork examined were found to be infested with the parasite, yet the commission reported that "it has not appeared that the salted and smoked pork, as it is brought into the market from America, exposes consumers in this country to any danger of trichinæ disease. They suggest that the native pig be investigated."

Strange proceedings have occurred in the Pennsylvania legislature lately, and a fist-fight in the Senate was an incident of Thursday evening. The low standard of self-respect among the Harrisburg statesmen can be judged from the fact that the Senator whom Emery, the oil millionaire, struck in return for the "lie" shook hands with his adversary, although the latter refused to withdraw the offensive word. And the Senate did not discipline the two offenders. But low as the Legislature has sunk, its members are not degraded enough to be willing to sit with Dukes, the slayer of Capt. Nutt, and he is warned not to attempt to take the seat to which he was elected.

No less than three inventors including Mr. Edison, have applied for patents for electric engines for the running of railroad trains. Mr. Edison is confident with his invention he can run trains fifty per cent. cheaper than is now done by steam. There are, of course, difficulties with the first application of a new force, which will undoubtedly be obviated by experience and knowledge. There is every reason to believe, whether the invention has been perfected in practical economy and convenience as yet, or not, that electric force can be used to take the place of steam for power as well as of gas for light, and that in no long time it will take its place as an adjunct or alternate if not as a substitute.

A suit involving the question whether information obtained by a physician from a patient, orally or by observation, must be disclosed on the witness stand, has been before the supreme court of Missouri. It was claimed that the statute referred only to what had been spoken to the doctor. The law declares that he "shall be competent to testify concerning any information acquired by him from any patient whom he may be attending in a professional character, and which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe as a physician or operate as a surgeon." The court holds that it will not do, while the mouth of a physician is closed as to the talk of his patient, to open it as to knowledge acquired from his own diagnosis of the case. The case referred to grew out of contested life insurance, and is regarded as of some importance to the insured.

California has tired of frequent changes in school books, through the endless solicitations of book publishers and other agents—and is about to provide a series of her own. A bill has passed the assembly of the state which provides that a board of commissioners shall be appointed to compile a series of books to be used in the public schools, and to be the property of the state. This board is to be composed of the superintendent of Public Instruction, the president of the State University and a public school teacher. The board is to compile a speller and a series of three readers, and, after this is done, is to compile one arithmetic, one geography, one grammar and one history of the United States. Each of these books is expected to be so comprehensive as to meet the wants of all grades of primary and grammar schools. It is probable that the state will soon feel the need of enlarging this brief catalogue of books. The idea of three readers, one grammar and one history is a somewhat novel one.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science, in its memorial to the several State Governors on preserving and increasing our forestry supplies, makes, in substance, the following recommendations: First, to protect by law, trees planted along the highways, and reduce taxes for encouraging such planting. Second, to exempt for a time from tax the increased value of land from planting trees in bare regions. Third, to appropriate money to existing societies, to be applied as premiums for successful tree-planting. Fourth, to offer prizes for the best reports and essays on practical forest-raising to be published and disseminated. Fifth, to encourage educational institutions in introducing a course of instrutions on tree-raising—such as by correctly-labeled specimen plantations, and the distribution of seed. Sixth, to impose penalties for careless or willful setting forest fires the waste from which cause has in some years greatly exceeded the amount of timber use.

The suspension of Associate Justice Everton J. Conger, of Montana, was ordered by the attorney general recently. The charge made against Mr. Conger was habitual drunkenness and gambling. A number of specific instances of a very disgraceful character were brought to the attention of the department, and upon official investigation the attorney general determined to suspend him. There was no specific charge of corruption, however, and the suspension may only be temporary.

The Freeman's Journal states that the correspondence which passed between the home office and Lowell, United States minister, has resulted in the former renouncing all hope of securing the extradition of the person known as "Number One." The Journal declares "Number One," whose name is Tyner, was in Dublin until the first day James Carey was examined at the hearing of the conspirators. He then managed to go to Bremen by way of Hull. From Bremen he proceeded to Rome, and thence to New York. He was a member of one of the London volunteer corps.

GENERAL NEWS IN BRIEF

The English colony at Rugby, Tenn., which has been in financial straits for some time, has just received a loan of $125,000 from a wealthy Englishman, Henry Kimber by name and a solicitor by profession. The lender receives as security a first mortgage on the Rugby tract of 25,000 acres and the improvements belonging to the board. Mr. Kimber is one of the original stockholders in the enterprise.

About 20,000 people annually visit Mount Vernon. In past years great difficulty was experienced in passing over the wide flats between the main channel of the Potomac and the wharf, but three years ago the improvement of the stream was begun and has been carried on ever since. It is now estimated that $5,000 more will be necessary to complete the improvement.

C. P. Markle & Sons, the largest paper manufacturers of western Pennsylvania, have made an assignment to Jesse H. Lippincott, of Pittsburg, without preferences. Liabilities, $400,000; assetts, nearly $1,000,000. Heavy failures in the west, general depression of trade and unprofitable investments caused the failure.

CRIMES AND CRIMINALS.

Utica, N. Y. Special Telegram: Jealousy of her husband unquestionably caused Mrs. Thomas Parks, of Herkimer, to murder her two children and herself recently. Her husband, who is a merchant, was with the deceased early in the evening, and went out ostensibly to fix fire in his store. He was not found to be informed of the tragedy until three hours after the affair was known throughout the town. He refused to tell where he had been. It was understood that Parks was spending a portion of his time with other women, and that this was known to his wife, who deliberately planned the murder and suicide. She lay down upon the bed with her children, aged respectively two months and four years, shot each in the head, and then shot herself.

In Lake Valley, Col. Maj. Fountain's command surprised two notorious rustlers, Jack Watts and Wm. Gillard, in their camp. While the soldiers were unsaddling they made a break for liberty, and had 200 yards the start, when Fountain ordered the men to fire, and both rustlers fell dead, riddled with bullets.

FOREIGN NEWS NOTES.

The condition of the queen's leg, which was injured by her fall Saturday last, continues satisfactory. Her majesty keeps in her room by the advice of physicians. She is, however, able to move about. The swelling in her knee is subsiding, and it is hoped by the physicians will disappear entirely in a few days. There has at no time been any ground for the excitement, which seems to have been created in New York, but which has not prevailed here. The matter creates very little comment in London.

London Cable: As the elaborate preparations for the czar's coronation progress, the activity of the nihilists increases. Hundreds of arrests are being made, and the deepest apprehension, both public and official, prevails. It appears to be thoroughly understood that nothing but superhuman precautions on the part of the police to protect the czar and his visitors will avail against the determination of the conspirators. Large numbers of the police are endeavoring to evade duty at Moscow during the period of the coronation, and are being discharged in consequence, and replaced by new men.

Immigrant Traffic for This Season.

The following is a correct table of the rates agreed upon for the transportation of immigrant outfits from Chicago, Milwaukee, Sheboygan, Racine, Kenosha, Joliet, Burlington, Muscatine, Davenport, Clinton, Rock Island and Moline to designated points in the Northwest, by way of the Manitoba line: To Fergus Falls, Wahpeton and Breckenridge, per car, $65; to Glyndon, Moorhead, Fargo, Davenport, Dublin, Everest, Casselton and Hope, $70; to Crookston, Mayville, Grand Forks, Portland and Hillsboro, $73; to Larimore and Bartlett, end of Devil's Lake extension, $80; to Warren, $81; St. Thomas, $88; Hamilton, $90; Hallock, $91; Bathgate, $93; St. Vincent, $95. The rates from St. Louis, Peoria, Bardstown, Alton, Hannibal, Keokuk and Quincy are $10 additional. On the Northern Pacific the rates to Fargo and all points between Fargo and Crystal Springs, inclusive are $70; Bismarck, $77; Mandan and Carrington, end of the Jamestown Northern, $80; Richardson, $90; Little Missouri, $103; Glendive, $116; Miles City, $125; Billings, $140 and Livingston, $150. The reductions, it should be remembered, apply to through rates only. They are from $12 to $35 per car less, but do not affect local rates between Chicago and St. Paul inclusive.

Bank Defalcation at St. Paul.

Rumors that something was wrong at the Second National bank at St. Paul, Minn., came to a focus Thursday, and it was discovered by the public that A. E. Ferte the cashier, had been displaced and A. M. P. Cowley reigned in his stead; that Directors Dean, Montfort and Griggs, the examination committee of the bank had found a defalcation of a serious amount. Late at night Fertie said that he had made up his mind to make a straight story, as there was no use in keeping it back any longer. It was not the bank's fault, nor the clerks fault it was not their mistakes, but he alone was to blame: he had taken the money during the past two years. On Tuesday morning he told the committee that there was no use in keeping it back any longer; he was short $7,000; of this, $1,000 was in mistakes and $1,000 in his credit, making the bank short not more than $5,000. This he explained to them and helped them on his books. He had no official or other to blame. He received $80 per month, and as he went with "the boys" he wanted to hold up his end and not appear to be stingy. This going with "the boys" was in visits once and a while to houses of ill fame, a bottle of wine, dinners down town, musical clubs, and expenses connected with them. His bondsmen were Mr. Edgerton, the president of the bank, and his father. He was sorry for both, and hoped that none of his associates or friends would ever be in a similar trouble, as it was driving him wild.

Minnesota Land Officer Suspended.

Soren Listoe, register of the land office at Fergus Falls, Minn., has been suspended, and George W. Boyington of that place was designated to act in his stead. The reason for the suspension was not given out by the department. Judge McFarland, commissioner of the general land office, when asked for the reason, said he did not know why Listoe was suspended. He seemed ignorant as to any cause for suspension, and said the first knowledge he had of it was obtained from the evening papers. The suspension he said was ordered by the president and the cause must have been sufficient to him or the charges, whatever they might be, would have been referred to the commissioner for investigation. Secretary Teller could not be seen but Assistant Secretary Joslyn was as ignorant of any cause for the suspension as Commissioner McFarland. It is hinted that the reason of the suspension is political, and that Knute Nelson was the power behind the throne. As the matter belongs to Nelson's district, he was probably allowed to control it, and as Listoe was a Kindred man it would be natural for Knute to want his place.

Murder Trial at Wapeton, Dak.

In the district court at Wapeton, Dak. (opposite Breckinridge, Minn.,) the grand jury on the 15th found an indictment against James G. Nash, for murder, and on arraignment, he pleaded not guilty as charged in the indictment. Nash, who is a railroad conductor it will be remembered, on Dec. 23, 1882, shot Newton for an alleged outrage upon the person of (Nash's) daughter, a girl of tender years. Newton was mortally wounded and died a week after the shooting. The girl was very positive in her evidence against the deceased. Public sympathy has ever since the tragedy inclined to Nash. The trial ended on the 24th by a disagreement of the jury. A juryman asked whether, in a case of disagreement and a new trial, the accused could be tried for manslaughter. The court explained to the jury why the accused could only be tried for the crime named in the indictment. Two or three of the jury expressed their opinion that they did not agree, and they were discharged by the court. Mr. Purcell, attorney for the accused, moved for an immediate retrial. The judge said his appointments would not admit of this. Bail was demanded and granted.

Presidential Appointments.

The president has appointed Lafayette J. Fulton postmaster at Casselton, Dak., vice T. Slingsby, suspended. The president has also appointed: John W. Bowie, collector of customs for the district of Yorktown, Va.; Joseph G. Chandler, receiver of public moneys at Yankton, Dak., vice Alexander Hughes, resigned, and James N. Stone, collector of internal revenue for the first district of Michigan, vice Trowbridge suspended.

DEATH OF EX-SENATOR HOWE.

The Postmaster General of the United States Dies on Sunday at Kenosha, After a Brief Illness.

Kenosha, Wis., special 25th. The Hon. T. O. Howe, postmaster general, died here to-day, after a brief illness. He arrived in this city from Washington two weeks ago last Thursday, in excellent health and spirits. He remarked while here at the time that his health had never been better. After spending a few days with his nephew, Col. J. H. Howe, he went to Green Bay, his old home, where he remained a week visiting friends and attending to private business. On Sunday a week ago he walked half a mile in the driving storm which prevailed on that day, and contracted a severe cold. He returned to this city on Monday feeling quite unwell, but was still able to be up a good portion of the time, until Thursday, when he was taken worse, but was not considered seriously ill. He had some fever during Thursday night, but on Friday was feeling comfortable all day. He spent a comfortable night Friday night, and on Saturday morning was feeling so much better, that under the advice of attending physicians, his son was telegraphed that it was not necessary for him to come. Judge Howe continued to feel better all day Saturday, so much so that under the advice of the physicians, Col. Howe telegraphed again last night that he had made very decided improvements during the day. At no time had any great uneasiness been felt about his condition, and it was supposed he would be able to proceed to Washington in a few days. Last night about 11 o'clock, however, he was taken worse, so much so that members of the family were telegraphed for to come on the first train. He continued to grow worse, until about 2 o'clock this afternoon when he passed away without a struggle. He was in the full possession of his reasoning faculties, until about 10 o'clock this morning. After that he was at times somewhat flighty, but recognized his daughter, who arrived at 11 o'clock from Washington, having started before the summons was received. He made no mention of his approaching death, and it is not known whether he realized that death was so near at hand or not. The remains will be interred at Green Bay in the family plot, by the side of his wife. A Green Bay special says: He had spent just a week here and his vigor and spirits were remarked by friends. He had been engaged quite actively during the week looking after various private interests, including one or two farms he has taken pleasure in having operated. He contracted the cold which terminated his life here on the last day of his stay, adding to it, friends here have learned, during the ride on the cars when leaving here. Judge Howe, as he was universally known here among his old neighbors, was among the oldest citizens of Green Bay, and certainly among the best known. During all his long public life, and the shifting scenes that have called him from here, he has clung to the associations of early days and ties that bind to a local habitation.

Timothy O. Howe was born in Livermore, Maine—the same town from which the Washburns sprung—in 1816, and was therefore in the sixty-seventh year of his age. He received an academic education, such as is given to most Maine lads of well-to-do parents, and supplemented this by private research and close study, which he persevered in throughout his life. When he attained maturity he studied law in the office of Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, afterward vice-president, in Paris, Maine, and admitted to the bar, led the life of the usual provincial lawyer until 1844, when he entered politics and made his first legislative appearance in 1845, having been elected to the state legislature in the campaign of the fall before. In the autumn of 1845 he removed to Wisconsin, the scene of his middle age forensic triumphs, and settled to the practice of his profession in Green Bay—his home ever since. He held distinguished positions in Wisconsin and in the national government. In 1850 he was elected judge of the circuit court. At that early date the circuit judges sitting in banc, constituted the supreme court of the State, and of that supreme bench Judge Howe was, for a time, chief justice but resigned in 1855 to asume his practice. In 1857 he was a candidate for the Senate against various competitors, the prize being won by Mr. Doolittle. When the legislature met in January, 1861, Mr. Howe was enabled to change his prefixed appellation from Judge to Senator. In 1867 Mr Howe was reelected to the senate and again in 1873, in the former campaign without any, and in the latter with but little, opposition.

Senator Howe and General Grant were warm friends, and in 1874 when Salmon P. Chase died Howe was offered the chief justiceship of the United States. This he declined, In 1879 Senator Howe was a participant in the well-remembered and exceedingly interesting senatorial contest known as the triangular fight, Matt Carpenter and E. W. Keys being his opponents. By good fortune and personal magnetism and a host of other favoring circumstances Carpenter won, and Howe returned to Green Bay. In 1881 he was appointed postmaster general by President Arthur.

Senator Howe married comparatively early in life, and his wife died in 1881. He had two children, Frank, now a practicing lawyer in Washington and for a short time chief clerk in the postal department, and a daughter, who married Colonel Enoch Totten, of Washington. It was at her house the late postmaster general assisted at the brilliant receptions of last winter. His other surviving relatives are a nephew, Colonel James H. Howe, of Kenosha, and a niece, Miss Grace Howe, of the same place. While not in poverty by any means, deceased was not wealthy, and nothing has ever been whispered against his probity and integrity.

The governor has received from the department of the interior at Washington a certified list of swamp and overflowed lands, of which 68,806.48 acres are subject to sale in the Duluth land district.

By a typographical error in the publication of the law supplement the words mortgager appeared in the ninth line of section 2 of law 101 and vender in line five, section 3 of the same law. The words should have been mortgagor and vendor.

Military Summer Encampment.

White Bear, has been fixed upon as the spot for the annual encampment of the first regiment, M. N. G., which commences on Monday, July 9, and lasts until the following Monday. The St. Paul & Duluth has kindly agreed to furnish free transportation for soldiers and impediments, and the site is unimpeachable in excellence, being near both St. Paul and Minneapolis, roomy and well adapted to maneuvers. It is possible that the second regiment will rendezvous here and camp at the same place, but nothing has been decided upon yet.

A Soldier's Monument in Minnesota.

Acker Post No. 21, G. A. R., of St. Paul, proposes erecting a monument in the near future to the Union soldiers of Minnesota. The site selected is capitol square, St. Paul. At the meeting of the post Thursday night, the question was brought up and thoroughly discussed, the discussion finally ending in the appointment of a committee of ten, to confer with a like committee from Garfield post, and to take such steps in the matter as might be deemed necessary. Capt. Simonton was appointed chairman of the joint committee. The plan of the monument is to be based upon that erected several years ago in Manchester, N. H., and the estimated cost is something in the neighborhood of $20,000. The money will be raised by subscription. A place will be left on the monument for the muster roll, and there will be inscribed thereon the names of those soldiers already dead and those who will later pay the debt of nature.

H. A. Bruno, the money bags candidate of Moorhead, was re-elected mayor Tuesday. W. K. Gould was elected municipal judge, and F. D. Larrabee special judge, under the court act recently passed by the legislature

Stark & Moore, bankers, of St. Peters, have united with others and organized a state bank, known as the Nicollet County Bank of St. Peters, with a paid up capital of $25,000. The following officers have been chosen; President, H. L. Stark; vice president, Julius Schlender; cashier, E. R. Moore; directors, George E. Case, Julius Schlender, John Peterson, L. M. Erickson, Isaac Lundeen, C. P. Stark, H. L. Stark and E. R Moore.

In the city election held Tuesday at Moorhead the regular candidate for city recorder was Mr. George N. Lamphere, who for seventeen years was in the civil service at Washington. He was appointment clerk in the treasury department for John Sherman and Mr. Windom and enjoyed the fullest personal confidence of both.

There were 1,510 deaths in Minneapolis last year, a little over 18 to the 1,000.

Dr. Alfred Fliesburg of North Branch, who was slanderously mentioned in connection with one of his female patients, has sent a full statement of the affair to the Rush City Post. He says, and his friends fully believe, the story is a foul case of blackmail, and that Dr. Fliesburg's conduct has been nothing but highly honorable.

Dr. Edward W. Johnson, a respected citizen of Owatonna, died in that city, aged seventy years.

The Morrison county bank has been established at Little Falls, with William Butler as president, John Simmons vice president, and J. D. Maxwell as cashier.

The general land office decides that the certification of George Johnson's pre-emption claim near Worthington in 1872, for the Sioux City railroad grant, was illegal, as no patent had issued. This opens up an important question of title to similar lands. It suggests that all lands thus certified cannot pass until patents are issued from them.

The canvass for subscriptions for the harvester works at Winona is successfully completed, the sum of $250,000 being raised. The result causes much good feeling and congratulation among all classes of business men. Several other manufacturing projects are under negotiation.

J. A. Mathews of Winona on Friday presented at the office of Auditor Braden an old Minnesota railroad state bond. The bond was destroyed and the matter adjusted

Mrs. Catharine Smith the first female settler in Winona, and the third white person to arrive at that point, celebrated with the aid of a large number of neighbors and friends the Fiftieth anniversary of her marriage on Wednesday.

Patrick McDonough, one of the oldest residents of Wabasha county, died very suddenly on Sunday last at his residence in Cook's Valley at the ripe age of eighty-two years.

Attorney General Hahn received a communication from the town authorities of Spring Valley, Fillmore county, asking for an opinion upon a certain vote in that town on local option. The result of the balloting was 134 for license and 134 otherwise cast. Of the latter, forty ballots contained nothing thereon to indicate whether they were intended to be considered for or against local option, but the result was determined by the local officials as a tie vote. The attorney general replied, in a brief and unofficial letter, that in his opinion every man voting who did not vote on the question of license was to be counted just the same as though he had voted against the license.

State Treasurer Kittleson has received Auditor Braden's draft for $12,448.37, state taxes of Ramsey county, collected as per March settlement.

Articles of incorporation of the Morris Creamery association, of Morris, Stevens county, filed with the secretary of state. The general purpose of the organization is the manufacture and sale of butter. The capital stock is given at $5,000, divided into 100 shares of $50 each. The officers of the concern named in the incorporation papers are Louis H. Stanton, president and ex-officio director, and H. B. Wolff and W. W. Griswold, directors.

J. M. Schwartz, cashier of the Belle Plaine bank, is about to commence a libel suit against S. A. Hooper, claiming damages to the amount of $10,000. The difficulty grew out of the settlement of the Huntsman estate, of which Hooper was administrator, he having accused Schwartz in the presence of others, of a breach of business fidelity.

Troy's Enoch Arden.

In 1856 Frank Lee and Eliza Bussey was married in this city, says a Troy (N. Y.) dispatch. Four years later Lee went to visit New York in search of employment. While there, and under the influence of liquor, he enlisted, and was sent to Arizona. About two years after he was taken prisoner by the Indians. Mrs. Lee, who found employment in the Ide collar factory, one day received a letter saying that her husband had been killed. Soon afterward she married Merritt Cody of West Troy. When Lee regained his liberty he wrote to his mother, who did not deem it advisable to tell Mrs. Cody that her first husband was alive. In another letter to his mother, Lee advised her to keep the fact of his being alive a secret. He then went to California where he made money. Desiring to see his mother again, he came east, arriving here last week. His mother told him that his wife had separated from her second husband on account of his ill-treatment, and was living with her daughter, who had married William Buckingham of this city. Representing himself as a sewing machine agent, Lee called on his daughter, and in the course of a conversation he told her he had been well acquainted with her father. The next night he called again and made himself known to his wife. An affecting scene followed: Lee and his wife will go to California in a few days. Cody threatens to cause the arrest of the woman on a charge of bigamy.

The Book Agent.

Brown, Jones, and Robinson, three as good fellows as ever melted the heart of a country trader to the merry music of the pliant chin, sat one evening last week in the smoking compartment of a chair-car on E. T H. Western Railroad. With them was a tall, thin, dyspeptic man with sandy hair, dressed in a rusty suit of black. Nature had endowed him with long legs and his tailor with short pants. His coat collar was rich enough in accumulated grease to keep a soap factory going for a month. His mouth was brass, and his cheek as hard as last years cider. He was a book agent. Already had he gobbled up the drummers for a "Life of Christ," and a "Pocket Encyclopedia," in two hundred and fifteen numbers, when suddenly a real live Jessie-James like train bandit opened the door, and stood pistol in hand in the presence of the quartet. Brown's soul sank into the heels of his boots. Beads of perspiration, big as snow-balls, stood on Jones' classic brow, while his hair lifted his hat two solid inches from the crown of his head. Robinson murmured the first verse of "Ever of Thee I'm Fondly Dreaming," and thought he was praying. But the book agent bounded from his seat with a glad smile and a "How do, stranger? Delighted to see you. Do let me show you my superb "History of Boone County," a perfect bonanza of domestic peace and happiness to every housekeeper who is fortunate enough to possess one. Three hundred pages of elegant letter-press, printed on toned paper, and embellished with fine steel engravings, and an official map of the state. A carefully compiled, correct topographical and historical"——

"Shut up!" roared the bandit.

"Shut up? You bet it will; and fastens itself with a double-action patent brass clasp—my own invention—and from its simplicity of design and beauty of construction, worth half the price of the book. Given away, sir—literally given away—for three dollars in boards, or four fifty in morocco with beveled edges."

"If yer say"——

"I do say it, sir. Look at this exquisite title-page, with a vignette portrait of the gifted author. Here you see a genealogical abstract chart, in which you can write the names of your illustrious ancestors and beloved family—births, marriages, deaths, and"——

"Stop!" shrieked the bandit, as the agent grasped him by the button-hole.

"You may well say stop, sir; I have said enough to make you ache to possess the beautiful volume, but I haven't yet begun to"——

"Sit down!" the robber roared, in a voice that made the puffs of the engine sound like the sighs of a sick zephyr, and loosened all the joints of Jones's limbs

"Biographical sketches of eminent men, glowing obituary with an original poem on death, agricultural statistics, tables of mortality, valuable notes on immigration, trade reports, all the geological"——

"Lemme go, or I'll blow the roof of yer head off," shrieked the robber, as he wrested himself from the agent's grasp, and dropped off the rear of the car into the gathering gloom of the coming night.

Then Robinsin drew from his pocket his faithful revolver, and looked big. Jones rolled his sleeves up and asked where the villain had gone to. Brown fished from under the spittoon a roll of bills, and hoped that they didn't think he'd been scared. But the agent sank wearily to his seat, and for the first time in all that long journey was silent for nearly four consecutive minutes.—Evansville Argus.

Receipts—Flour, 70,550 bbls; wheat, 14,550 bu; barley, 12,570 bu. Shipments—Flour, 22,153 bbls; wheat, 850 bu; barley, 5,803 bu.

ST. PAUL.

FLOUR—Patents, Orange blossom, $7; Red Cross, straights, $6.25; "Capitol" family, $5.75; XXXX, $4.50@5.50; in bbls 25c extra; outside brands, 25@50c per bbl less, according to quality. Buckwheat flour, $6@6.50 per bbl. Rye flour, $4.50 per bbl. Graham, $5 per bbl.

WHEAT—The market was very dull, there being no particular demand. Offerings were only moderate, receipts being light. Chicago was up and down in the market; but this market was not affected thereby, in the absence of trading. Prices were steadily held, but at quotations showing a slight easing off from last week's figures. No. 1 hard, $1.10 bid, $1.12 asked; May, $1.17 asked; No. 2 hard, $1.05 bid, $1.07 asked; No. 2, 98c@$1 bid.

CORN—Dull, but a little more firmly held on light receipts; No. 2, 48c bid, 52c asked; May, 54c asked; new mixed, 49c asked. Sales: 1 car, No. 2, 54c.

OATS—Nothing doing in first hands. Local inquiry moderate; market fairly steady at generally unchanged quotations: No. 2 mixed, 38c bid, 40c asked; April, 39c bid, 41c asked; May, 43c asked; No. 2 white, 39c bid, 42c asked; No. 3 white, 38c bid. Sale; 1 car No. 2 mixed, last half April, 41c.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—There is no quotable alteration in prices but this staple is not selling at all well. The fact is the market has been overstocked, and while accumulations are being worked off pretty fast, buyers are not ready to load up again just yet. There is about two-fifths of the capacity of the city at work and still the daily sales do not equal the daily output. Patents are quoted at $6.50@7; straights, $5.50@6.25; clears, $5.25@5.75; low grades, $2@3.25 per bbl.

MILLSTUFFS—Bran was in a little better request yesterday. The sales of bulk on track were usually at about $10 per ton; and shorts at about $11; coarse corn meal at $17.50@19, on track; $18@19.50 f. o. b.; mixed feed, $18@19.50 on track; $18.50@21 f. o. b.

WHEAT—There was a good demand for spot and for futures yesterday. Spot No. 1 hard sold to the extent of all offered at $1.11½. Sales to arrive in ten days brought the same as spot. For May, $1.15 was bid, and $1.16 was asked. No. 2 hard brought $1.08; No. 1 Northern, $1.07@1.08; No. 2 Northern, $1.04@1.05; No. 2 was offered at $1.02, and $1 was bid.

CORN—Weak and lower; No. 2 from store was held at 51c in store, 52c f. o. b. May was offered in 5,000 bu lots at 52½c, 52c was bid for it.

OATS—Steady at 40c for No. 2.

Up to last Saturday the Duluth company had logs to the amount of 15,500,000 feet in the water.

Personal Mentions.

In a school near Louisville, where a gang of rude boys were rebellious and defied the female teacher employed, one of the trustees supplied himself with rods, and going to school flogged every mother's son of them in turn. He now has on his hand a law-suit for each boy.

Hang Ah Duck, a Chinese murderer at San Rafel, Cal., anticipated his hanging with the utmost satisfaction. He emplored the judges to fix an early day for the execution, believing that after death he would be in purgatory for a period of not less than one year nor more than twenty, during which period he would be able to return to the earth and torment his enemies. This doctrine caused him to look forward with so much pleasure to his death that he attempted suicide, and when taken to the scaffold jumped for joy.

For nearly twenty-five years Frank Hess had been bell ringer of St. Liborious church, in St. Louis, and he attained the age of 74 years. Last Sunday there was a funeral at the church, and his friends told him that he was too feeble to toll the bell; but, believing that no one could do the work as well as he, he went up to the belfry and rang the knell. He did not come back as promptly as usual, and a friend going up found him dead.

Miss Saunders, the daughter of the senator from Nebraska, is said to be the prettiest young lady in Washington society. She has blue eyes, pure golden hair and an exquisite complexion, with a perfect cupid's bow of a mouth, and a countenance of the greatest sweetness and beauty.

A London correspondent who has investigated the matter, finds that the prince of Wales did write the cable congratulation to Mrs. Langtry which was published in this country on her arrival here. The London press did not dare to print the scandal which her conduct subsequently gave rise to in this country.

According to London Truth, Ulysses and Jesse Grant are among the latest arrivals in Paris. They are going south with their respective wives, returning in the spring to meet Gen. and Mrs. Grant, who are going over to Europe for the summer.

A writer in the Figaro asserts that the floral crowns piled round Gambetta's coffin in the Palais Bourdon were worth more than £20,000. There were more than four thousand of them, and the smallest must have cost 50 francs. Paris and its environs produced them all, natural as well as artificial.

Pope Leo XIII. yesterday completed the fifth year of his pontificate, as he was elected the successor of Pope Pius IX. on Feb. 20.1878. His coronation as pope, however, did not take place until nearly two weeks later, on March 4, 1878. In the Catholic churches throughout the world the clergy were directed to recite during the masses yesterday morning the special prayers which have been set apart for the benefit of the pope; and in Rome a special service, attended with much pomp, was held in the Vatican.

Congressmen Van Aernam, of New York, recently said: "I attended the memorial services of Abraham Lincoln in 1866, and those of Garfield in 1881. Of the 400 great men who were gathered on the former occasion, only nineteen were present at the later. In sixteen years a political generation has passed away. We live and die rapidly on Capitol Hill."

A dinner was given at the Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia one day this week to William G. Malin, steward of the institution, on the occasion of his retirement, aged eighty-two years, after a connection with the hospital extending over fifty-nine years. About one hundred gentlemen—a large number of them leading members of the medical profession—participated.

Just for Fun.

Honest criticism: An Arkansas editor who was elected County Judge some time ago did not approve of his own administration and in an able editorial written by himself said: "It is with sorrow that we announce that the County Judge of this county, and the editor of this paper, is a d——d fool."—Arkansaw Traveller.

The pleasing element of danger: An Englishman shooting small game in Germany said to his host, that there was a spice of danger in shooting in America. "Ah!" said the host, "you like danger mit your sport? Then you go out shooting mit me. The last time I shoot mine bruder-in-law in the schtomack."—Hartford Times.

Remedy worse than the disease: Patient—"Ah, doctor I am not well." Doctor—"That doesn't astonish me in the slightest. Your ill health is the result of going out to parties and late suppers. If you desire to regain your health you must renounce such habits." Patient—"Yes; but then, doctor, what is there to live for?"—The Judge.

Exercise: "Fact is," said the physician, "you don't take enough exercise." "Don't take enough exercise!" exclaimed the patient in astonishment. "Why, doctor, I belong to the Episcopal Church and attend service every Sunday. For heaven's sake, what more would you have?"

Why Hobson objected: "Hobson," said Muggins, "they tell me you have taken your boy away from the Graded School. What that's for?" "Cause," said Hobson. "the master ain't fit to teach 'em." "Oh," said Muggins, "I've heard he's a very good master." "Well," replied Hobson, apologetically," all I know is he wanted to teach my boy to spell 'taters with a "p."—New Berne (N. C.) Journal.

A preacher in demand: A day or two ago on the Lake Shore road, a young man rushed into a parlor car and shouted at the top of his lungs: "Is there a minister of the gospel in this car?" "I am one," replied a tall, clerical-looking gentleman. "Oh, I'm so glad!" exclaimed the young man, grasping the brother by the hand. "A lady has fainted in the next coach; won't you be kind enough to lend me your whisky flask?"—Drake's Travelers' Magazine.

Lent and its uses: Conversation overheard in a street car: First young debutante—"Oh, I am so sorry Lent is here." Second ditto—"Oh, how wicked! I'm real glad, for my ball-dresses were getting frightfully shabby, and, besides, mamma says I am looking a little worn with the late hours and brilliant lights, and I am to go to bed early and sleep a good deal during the day in the dim lighted church. Lent is really a great comfort to me," and the dear thing sighed piously.—Boston Herald.

The war department occasionally receives petitions for the discharge of Serg. Mason, but nothing has yet been done about it, the president, so far as can be learned, taken no steps toward the exercise of executive clemency to relieve him from the ending year's imprisonment.

[illegible] The Nominations.

[illegible] Ward, John McKinnon [illegible] nominated Alderman for two years, [illegible] Fortier for one. County News.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Hon. Marcus Johnson, is looking after his investments in Fisher for a few days.

Ole Olsen, has sold his entire stock of goods to Johnson & Stephens, and departed to other lands.

Mr. H. W. Donaldson, the bonanza Red River Valley farmer who has been sojourning in the City of Mexico for the last six weeks, has just passed north to his home in Marshall County.

The village election returned the old officers: Trustees, F. S. DeMers, Lou Freeman and John Gleason; Treasurer, Hugh Thompson; Justices of the Peace, A. D. Stephens and C. U. Webster.

It is announced that Publer of the Alert, has bought a newspaper outfit at Brainerd, and will also move the Alert fixtures to that place for the purpose of issuing a larger sheet, and extending his usefulness.

When we remember that this is a prairie country called timberless, it becomes a surprise to see the great logs now piled about the McKnight saw mill. One measured 48 inches in diameter and over 16 feet long.

Capt. Russell's wife, daughter and son-in-law, have returned from their southern trip, and will occupy the homestead property this summer. The captain will again sail the bold Saskatchewan, during the summer navigation.

Hugh Thompson has bought out his partners interests in the remaining property of the Red Lake Flouring Mills, and will immediately build and equip on the old ground occupied by the burned mill, a custom and manufacturing mill containing all modern devices for manufacturing flour.

No village in the land is more justly entitled to the high praise of generosity so far as its means may go then the village of Fisher. Ready and quick to respond to all calls upon it benevolence is a handsome record. Within six hours after the destruction of the house and shop of James Brownlee by fire, upwards of $300 in cash was raised for the aid of this suffering family.

The family of E. A. Bradish, has returned from the east, where they passed the winter with friends.

We are pleased to note a call from Mr. C. Johnson, Auditor McGuire's worthy assistant, who designs passing a few days on his farm near this place.

Election returns from town of Hubbard made Nels O. Palsarud, Chairman, Ole Gilbertson and Halvor G. Dale Supervisors, Clerk, Frank Hanson; Treasurer, B. J. Kalstad; Assessor, Frank Hanson; Justices of the Peace, Andrew Thompson and Martin Christopherson; Constables, Halvor G. Dale, M. J. Kolstad. Road Master of District No. 3, P. J. Kuffer, No. 4, John Ellingston.

C. L. Brainard, principal of the school leaves next week for his home in New York, to visit friends, and expects to return in a short time to make this his future home. And we will say right here, that Mr. Brainard has given general satisfaction as principal of the school, and considering the difficulties he had to encounter in the early part of the term has been remarkably successful, we wish him a pleasant visit and safe return.

It is with regret that we announce the intention of the Rev. Cathcart of the Presbyterian society to give up his charge. But an old trouble, aggravated by study has returned, making it absolutely neccessary for him to resort to some out door occupation. Intense head pains, dizziness and loss of concentration of ideas are the symptoms and warning must be headed. He has taken the farm of Geo. R Irwin for the season, but will serve the society here until some one is found here to occupy the Presbyterian pulpit. During his ministrations the society has flourished beyond all expectations, and he has become a general favorite among all classes. The church loses the services of an eloquent, studeous, pains-taking servant, and the society a loved and devoted pastor. All will wish him speedy recovery.

On Wednesday morning about two o'clock the two story building owned by Andrew Engen, situated on Third street, and occupied by Tom. Kelley as a saloon was discovered to be on fire. The flames spread so rapidly that the occupants of adjoining buildings barely escaped. On the south was the shop of James Brownlee with his family residing above, adjoining on the north was the recently completed and extensive [illegible] establishment of T. A. Dunlava. The three structures with nearly their contents soon became a prey to the devouring flames. [illegible] commenced at an hour when the village was in the most quiet slumber, following a day of considerable excitement, and the populace were slow to arrive. After the occupants had been rescued, every effort was made to save property but little could be done. Mr. Dunlava's loss on building and stock will amount to something like $10,000, covered by an insurance of $6,000. Of which Cooke's agency sustains $2,000 in the Springfield of Mass., and Thompson's agency $2,000 in the Orient, and $2000 in the Underwriters. Engen was insured in the Springfield for $700, and Kelley in the Orient for $700. The heaviest loss falls on Brownlee, as he loses every thing, household goods and all. Mr. Dunlava will occupy the Ole Olson Store with a new stock until he can rebuild.

Beltrami Items.

The days are growing perceptibly longer.

Some beautiful Easter cards have been received here from eastern friends which tell us, though absent, we are not forgotten.

Mr. and Mrs. Reis and Herbert Jackson are expected to return to their Minnesota homes this week.

The pleasure seekers of this place attended the dance at Conery,s It is hard to tell which they enjoyed most, tripping the light fantastic toe or walking, as some of them walked part of the way home; the sleighing being good, we failed to see their object.

Conundrum—Why is it that a certain young man of Lockhart every time your correspondent meets him, refers to the "cuteness of that smart Aleck?"

JIMMY.

Norman County Banner: John Sontag, a German, living about ten miles west of here, committed suicide last Friday, by firing a ball from a revolver through his breast. The facts, as we learn them are as follows: Sontag's property was heavily mortgaged, a party in Moorhead holding a chattel mortgage covering all his personal property. Last fall Mrs. Sontag left him, and lately his creditors have come upon him for their pay Last Friday the Moorhead mortgage was given to officer Jas. Campbell, with instructions that it be immediately foreclosed. Accordingly, Campbell, with several men, and teams enough to haul the property away, went to Sontag's place and executed the above orders While they were engaged loading grain and machinery, they heard the report of a revolver, and going to the house found the old man upstairs, dead. This is the whole story, but there are facts which might be taken from the evidence given at the coroners inquest, that we cannot give, owing to our not being allowed to make use of said evidence. Mr. Sontag was 55 years of age.

Grand Forks Herald: It is stated upon good authority, that East Grand Forks is to have another addition. It is to be located east of Trail's and Mrs. Griggs' additions and is owned by Arne Higlem, county commissioner of Polk County. It will be known as Higlem's addition to East Grand Forks. Alexander Oldham will commence the survey Saturday or Monday of next week.

On Saturday last Mr. G. S. Barnes purchased the Tyler mansion, in Oak Grove addition, paying for it the sum of $40,000 This is the most notable transfer of city property that has been made this season. To a tender foot the price might seem a trifle large, but old-timers who are familiar with the rapid rise of all kinds of real estate in the Red River Valley will pronounce it a good bargain both for Mr. Barnes and Mr. Tyler. The residence is perhaps the most elegant and costly ever erected in the territory, and, situated as it is in a beautiful suburban quarter, it is unquestionably the most attractive home in Fargo.—[Fargo Republican.

The Polk County Agricultural and Driving Association.

A meeting of this new association was held in City Hall on Thursday evening last and considerable interest manifested. The report of the committee on subscriptions showed that forty-two shares had been taken, twenty-four being paid up. Committee on location reported in favor of the Sathre tract, recommending its purchase. The committee on organization asked further time, which was granted. The meeting adjourned until saturday evening at which time it was again adjourned until Wednesday evening, March 28th. Meeting called to order promptly at 8:30, 9:00 or 9:30, somewhere along there, the delay being caused by the absence of an important committee report. A lively discussion was had among the few who did attend, chiefly upon the size of the grounds needed. A committee of five was finally created to view the landscape o'er and decide whether the society would carry out its original idea of buying 20 acres, or whether they will insist upon thirty or forty acres and get none. The committee are D. Jacobus, I. U. Jennings, E. M. Walsh, R. Houston and W. D. Hurlbut. Adjourned till Wednesday evening, April 4th.

COUNCIL PROCEEDINGS.

COUNCIL CHAMBERS,
Crookston, March 20th, 1883.

All present except Alderman Nolan. Petitions of Wm. Knight and James Bruce were rejected. A committee was appointed to extend Elm street to Central avenue; referred to M. R. Brown, T. C. Shapleigh and Judge Brower. Report of committee in abatement of taxes on mill property accepted. Moved by Alderman Stuart that the contract concerning quantity of water to constitute a water power be referred to the city engineer. Moved that the city take an invoice of bill of material of K. D. Chase and weigh the same. Moved that the license of Bekken by transferred to Peter Hass; also that report of committee on telephone business be accepted and instruments be placed in the pump house and engine room at a yearly rental of $80. Messrs. Witte, Berndt & Matt were granted a forty horse power at a rental of $1 per month, and the Recorder was instructed to draw a lease for the same, the city reserving the right to cancel by giving 60 days notice. The Recorder was instructed to order suitable hooks and pulleys for hoisting hose in the tower. Bills of K. D. Chase, for $25, W. D. Hurlbut, $18, and Cowing Bros. for $40.90 were allowed. Adjourned until Friday evening, April 6th, 1883.

Knute Steenerson's newspaper outfit was loaded onto sleighs on Saturday ready to be toted to St. Hilaire. Knute is moving his building toward the outfit and when the two meet he will set up an opposition paper at St. Hilaire.

C. C. Utzinger sent a portion of his goods to St. Hilaire on Friday, with Tommy Box as driver, and C. C. will follow shortly. Contrary, however, to the announcement by the Spectator, C. C. does not intend to reside at St. Hilaire. He has hired a competent man to conduct his business there and will reside in this city as usual.

Mr. M. W. Jensen and C. L. Hanson, of Garden, were in the city last week They report prospects good in the Garden town of the county and expect to see more than twice as much wheat sowed this year than there was last. Mr. Jensen says he shall sow more oats than wheat this year and shall seed a few acres to clover and timothy.

A visit to Forsberg & Karlson's studio and art gallery on Main Street is enough to convince one that we have among us an institution that would do credit to larger cities than Crookston. The gentlemanly proprietors are both gentlemen of large experience and the walls are covered profusely with evidences of their handiwork. They have also all of the latest instruments required in their art, and are prepared to do first-class work promptly. Call and see them at their parlors on Main Street near the old court house hall.

TO PARTIES DESIRING INSURANCE.

We represent the following old and reliable Fire Insurance Companies:

Farm for Sale [illegible]

FERTILE, Minn., March 20, 1883.

The snow is fast leaving us, and the fields and hillsides are showing the bare black ground. Our farmers are getting ready for spring's work, and great attention will be paid to securing clean No. 1 hard seed wheat, and pure oats.

Our election though conducted peacefully, was at times quite exciting.

Through some neglect, we fear our bridge here will not be built in time for high water. Our people will know who to blame.

Mr. A. J. Gilmore will probably put in a drug store here and will buy out the drug stock of LeDuc & Co. Mr. G. is an old, experienced druggist, and will in time build up a good trade.

Times are good here and trade is good in consequence.

Wheat comes into the mill quite lively and the flour manufactured is very fine.

La Duc & Co. have just received a carload of Groceries and are now prepared to sell goods as low as the lowest.

Mr. O. L. Hamery is busy in laying out Mr. B. Sampson's addition to the City of Crookston.

H. O. Grodevig is finishing his house and our blacksmith is getting ready to put up a dwelling.

Sahler & Co. have sent for a cockle machine for their mill, and will clean seed wheat for the farmers at very reasonable rates.

Plenty of chances to secure improved lands here, as some parties have now proved up on their pre-emptions and want to get homesteads and need the money they can get for the first to improve the second. J.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of one hundred and ninety-six 73/100 dollars, which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Thomas Lambert and Josephine Lambert, his wife, to Carl Kretzschmar, bearing date the 26th day of November, A. D. 1881, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 28th day of November, A. D. 1881, at 1:10 o'clock p. m., in book "B" of Mortgages, on page 533, to secure the payment of one certain promissory note dated Nov. 26th, 1881, made by said Thomas Lambert and Josephine Lambert, whereby they promised to pay to the order of Carl Kretzschmar the sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars with interest at ten per cent. per annum until paid, payable one year after date, and no action or proceeding at law or otherwise having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof,

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: The northwest quarter (¼) of Section number twenty-four (24) in Township number one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-six (46), in Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, will be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises and twenty-five dollars, attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Crookston in said County and State, on the thirteenth day of April, A. D. 1883, at ten o'clock a. m. of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated February 27th, A. D. 1883.

Johnson, of St. Paul, Minn., and such other persons as may hereinafter associate themselves with them, have agreed to associate, and do hereby associate themselves for incorporation and to become incorporated under and pursuant to the laws of the State of Minnesota, and more particularly under the provisions of Title 2, of Chapter 34, of the General Statutes of Minnesota, and all acts amendatory thereof, and for that purpose have adopted and signed the following articles of incorporation:

ARTICLE ONE.

The name of this corporation hereby formed is "The Crookston Improvement Company." The general nature of its business shall be the buying, owning, improving, selling and dealing in lands, tenements and hereditaments, and the laying out, platting, purchasing and selling townsites and additions, and to buying, owning, improving, selling and dealing in town lots.

The principal place of transacting the business of said corporation shall be in Crookston, Minn.

ARTICLE TWO.

This corporation shall commence on the 3d day of March, A. D. 1883, and shall continue for a period of thirty years thereafter.

ARTICLE THREE.

The amount of capital stock of said corporation shall be $25,000, which shall be divided into 500 shares of $50 each, and shall be paid in upon demand of the Board of Directors.

ARTICLE FOUR.

The highest amount of indebtedness or liability to which said corporation shall at any time be subject, shall be the sum of $5,000.

ARTICLE FIVE.

The government of the corporation and the management of its affairs shall be vested in a board of five directors, out of whose number and by whom one shall be elected President, and one Secretary and Treasurer of the Corporation, and such President and Secretary shall be ex-officio President and Secretary of the board of directors

The board of directors shall be elected annually by the stockholders, at the annual meeting of the corporation, to be held on the 1st Tuesday of May, in each and every year.

ARTICLE SIX.

Bernhard Sampson, Iver Tharaldson, Julius Bjornstad, Frederick J. Wilcken and Aleck E Johnson, shall constitute the first board of directors of said corporation, and Bernhard Sampson shall be the first president of the corporation and Iver Tharaldson the first secretary and treasurer of the corporation, and said directors and officers shall hold their offices until the next annual meeting of the corporation, to be held on the first Tuesday in May, A D. 1883.

In testimony whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals this 1st day of March, A. D. 1883.

BERNHARD SAMPSON, [SEAL.]
I. THARALDSON, [SEAL.]

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Pile driving has commenced on the race.

The sound of the ax and hammer is heard in every part of the town. Building is getting lively.

The winter term of the school in this district will end on Friday. We regret to learn that there will be no summer term.

The business between this place and Crookston through the "hellophone" is so great that Jo. Smith's ear is callased by holding the trumpet to it so much.

A dramatic company has been organized under the auspicies of the Franklin Institute, and have in preparation "Among the Breakers," which will be produced in about three weeks.

Red Lake Falls is supplying St. Hilaire with lumber. Come often gentlemen, between our two steam saw mills and Prentice & McClatchie's large stock we can keep you supplied.

Mr. A. E. Wilder, of Grand Forks, is in town and will locate here and open an insurance office.

George Crist, who came here last Wednesday, left on Friday last fully impressed with the future greatness of Red Lake Falls. His friends here look for his speedy return to embark in business.

The ice breaker to protect the bridge across the Red Lake River at this place, is now completed and is very substantially and well constructed. The crib is made of solid oak timbers, the cross pieces being fitted in with great care and made secure with iron bolts. The rocks used for filling, some of which weigh one and one-half tons, are placed in the crib so close as to resemble dry masonry in a sea wall. Commissioner Gervais, under whose supervision the work was done, has devoted his time to the construction and deserves great credit for the executive work.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

From the Spectator.

Deputy Sheriff Hopkins of Crookston took in the sights of the New Chicago one day last week.

The material for Mr. Steenerson's new paper arrived last Saturday, and the Red Lake Independent will probably make its bow to the public on Tuesday next.

Mr. A. Allen, of Crookston, proposes to start a brick yard in our town. He has secured the ground and will ship his machines up here before the roads break up. This is well.

Mr. John Burkee, of the firm of Burkee Bros., has received the appointment of Postmaster of St Hilaire. We have reason to believe that Mr. B. will make an efficient P. M.

Messrs. Wm. Guse and John Hack, two prominent merchants of Crookston came out to pay their respects to the "coming city" on Saturday last. Of course they expressed the usual amount of surprise at our rapid and substantial growth etc., but we are getting used to this kind of thing and take it only as a matter of couase.

The Supervisors in the town of River Falls mean business. They intend laying out several roads in that town, and have served notices of hearing upon the owners of the land through which the proposed roads are to pass. The action of the board in this instance is commendable, as nothing could be of more value to the surrounding country than good roads.

So long as Dune Terry runs a livery stable in Crookston, we have no need of a railroad between here and that town. He started from Crookston at ten o'clock on Saturday morning last with Major [illegible] family, drove up here, chatted an hour or two with the boys and was back home again at eight o'clock in the evening. This is the first case on record where a man drove from Crookston to [illegible] and back in one day, but Dune keeps good horses and drives them for all they are worth.

Carman Carvings.

Carman Courier.

Another of the Carman boys returned Tuesday in the person of Stephen Fisher, who has been absent during the winter in the pineries of Wisconsin.

Mr. Charles Dunning, of Hudson, Wisconsin, is stopping in Carman for several weeks with the intention of locating permanently in this great Northwest.

That there will be a large increase in the population of our county during the present summer is evidenced by the number of parties looking up permanent locations.

Mr Dugdale, of Maple Lake, has been hauling lumber from this station for several days past for the purpose of erecting a store and dwelling house at that place.

A Mr. Millen assumed the duties of overseer in the store of E. D. Childs & Co., yesterday. The gentleman hails from Thief River where he has a claim, and while here will act as chief mogul.

A gentleman from the headwaters of the Clear Water River informed a Courier reporter Tuesday that upwards of fifteen million logs were on the banks of that river awaiting a freshet to be floated to market.

Citizens of Carman will be sorry to learn that Mr. K. Knudsen intends removing to Thief River next week where he will engage in farming on his claim dear that place. Mr. Knudsen has filled the position of postmaster in this place for some years with entire satisfaction to all parties concerned, and he and his estimable lady have many friends in this vicinity who will be sorry to loose their genial faces from their midst, and will unite with us in wishing them unbounded success in their new departure.

The New Northwest and Its Growth.

From the Minneapolis Tribune.

Dwellers in the Eastern States of the Union and in European countries are sometimes at a loss to understand why it is that the western tide of immigration and settlement has been so generally deflected northwestwardly into Minnesota and Dakota, while the plains of Nebraska and Kansas have been comparatively neglected. The explanation is not far to seek, and none is even necessary to one who is familiar with the actual condition, climatic and otherwise, on the western frontier. The fact is, that immigration moving due westward along the zone of which Ohio and Illinois form a part has struck a stone wall in Central Nebraska and Kansas in the form of insufficient rainfall and has recoiled. Settlement in the last named States some time since reached the western limit of the rain belt and every attempt to push agriculture beyond that boundary has resulted in failure and wherever the experiment has been made by private individuals instead of wealthy railroad corporations, disaster has been added to disappointment. The inevitable result has been that the human flood from the older States and from across the Atlantic has turned northward to the waiting and fertile fields, first of Minnesota and then of Dakota. Practical experiment soon demonstrated the fact that north of latitude 42° the area of natural irrigation during the growing season extends westward much farther than it does to the southward of that line, and hence the farming can be carried on at points in Dakota and Montana which correspond in longitude to regions in Kansas and Colorado that through aridity can never be used for any other purpose than grazing. This condition of things was obscured for a time by the misleading statistics of precipitation—the fact being forgotten, or not recognized that in the higher and colder latitudes much less rainfall is required for fertility during the year, owing to the greatly reduced evaporation. The short, rapid growing season in Minnesota, Dakota and the farther Northwest is characterized by bright, long and very warm days with cool nights—conditions which conspire to affect the greatest productiveness with the least practicable fall of rain.

Then when speaking of the recent and present wonderful activitity in settlement north of the 46th parallel, and the falling off in emigration to more southern regions, it is to be remembered that Kansas and Nebraska have been open for a quarter of a century, while it is only within five or six years that North Dakota, for example, has been made really accessable by rail and hence known to that part of the world which is seeking free homes. Desirable government lands were long since absorbed westward to the rain limit below the 42d parallel and land in second hands has reached a value which practically takes it out of the reach of the ordinary immigrant and home-seeker. In this new Northwest the richest and the last great body of free farming lands has but recently been thrown open to the world, and the result is a rush of new citizens and such a building of empire as even this continent has seldom if ever witness. When this final northwestern heritage is absorbed and passing from the ownership of the United States to that of individuals the process of homesteading will be practically ended in the great republic. There will remain grazing lands, mineral lands and some forest lands, but in ten years from to-day the landless will seek in vain for fertile agricultural acres belonging to the nation out of which they can carve free homesteads. These are some of the reasons which account for the fabulous growth of the new Northwest.

On Saturday last, a team in some way got detached from the sleigh and started on a mad race along Main Street toward the river. When in front of Juve & Bergland's they collided with a sleigh knocking the sleigh box plum across the street and turning a complete somersault over the sleigh they landed broadside in the mud. Strange to say the horses sustained but slight injuries.

At the meeting last night of the Agricultural Society the committee submitted their report and a committee was appointed to see Mr. Sathre with a view to the purchase of five acres additional. This committee to report at the next meeting on Saturday evening next, at which time the organization will be perfected and it is hoped that all who have taken stock will be present to assist in the election of officers and other important business.

OUT OF PROPER NOUNS.

Ah, maiden fair, with golden hair,
I can not tell the love I bear thee,
Thy chiseled arms, thy countless charms,
Prompt me with Venus to compare thee—
But that's a sentiment I chose
When flirting with your cousin Rose.

Your eyes so bright! your teeth so white!
Your cheeks like core of ruddy melon!
Your queenly style! your matchless smile!
Suggest to me the Trojan Helen—
But then your sister Kate would say
I said the same of her to-day.

Your winning face! your dainty grace!
Your glance coquettish, arch and tricky!
Your voice so sweet! your fairy feet!
Ah, what are these but limbs of Psyche?
But, bless you, that same proper noun
I've tossed at every girl in town.

—Rome Sentinel.

FALSE PRETENCES.

"Am I to go to the city this summer?" asked Erma Weston, of her indulgent father, after the winter was passed.

"No, you are not," said Papa Weston, trying to speak very positively. "You are going to 'mammy' if she will consent to receive you, and I want you to come home with rounder redder cheeks." (Here the cheeks had to be pinched.) "And mind, there must be less of this folly about going out when next winter comes."

"Then if our home is to be converted into a hermitage," laughed Erma, "I mean to prepare for it by learning to cook, so that I may cheer my solitude with clear soups and perfect puddings."

"I only wish you were in earnest," replied her father.

A few weeks later Erma was installed in the home of her old nurse, Mrs. Webb—"mammy," Erma had called her.

The next morning after her arrival, she astonished Mrs. Webb by entering the kitchen at six o'clock, arrayed in a cotton dress and apron.

She laughed merrily at the look of wonder on the good woman's face, and won her respect forever by declaring, "I intend to pretend I am your daughter while I am here, and learn to bake bread and wash clothes."

"You may not get 'em so nice the first time, but it'll be wonderful pleasant to have you help about the work with me."

"And remember you are not to address me as 'Miss Erma,' but only 'Erma'; and I want to begin now," she said, with a glance about the room in quest of employment.

"It seems like a pity to spoil them pretty hands. I remember how I used to love the touch of 'em when you was a baby, 'an yer poor mother a-lyin' in her grave."

"Never mind my hands. I fancy yours might have been beautiful had they not been so useful."

"Then you might peel these taters an' cut 'em up, while I go out an' milk."

When Mrs. Webb returned with her pail of foaming milk, she remarked, "There's a youngish-lookin' feller comin' this way, with a valise in his hand. I wonder, now, if ain't the new schoolmaster? Ye see, the scarlet fever broke out in our district last April, an' broke up the school. The school-missus she got married, an' we had to git a new teacher."

The "youngish-lookin' feller" soon made his appearance at the kitchen door.

"My name is Harris," said the young man. "I have engaged to teach your school, and would like to board here. I trust you will be able to accommodate me."

"Come in an' take a chair. You can stay, though the last teacher did make a lot o'work, what with pickin' up things she'd leave about, an' carryin' water up the step to her room. This is my daughter Erma, Mr. Harris."

And Mrs. Webb gave Erma a warning glance as she thus introduced her.

"You have a very handsome daughter, Mrs. Webb. Will she be one of my pupils?"

"You would not dare thus insult me if ——" began Erma, with a flash in her brown eyes.

"Erma!" interrupted Mrs. Webb.

And the girl smiled quietly, and was silent.

If the fly on the window had suddenly buzzed about his face, and shown a capacity for stinging, Mr. Harris would not have been more astonished.

"I thought people of this class liked plain speech," was his mental comment, as he gazed on Erma's flushed cheeks and flashing eyes.

"Forgive me, Miss Erma; I have been too frank, I fear," said he, with grave sincerity, but with a suspicion of unconscious condescension that was a new experience to our high-bred heroine, who was accustomed to receive homage always and everywhere.

"Yes," she replied, "I will forgive you if you will try to remember that the humblest roof sometimes shelters a lady."

Her tones were so haughty that he was startled into taking another look at her face—he had been gazing past her, out of the window; and he answered kindly, with a half-formed smile hovering around his lips, "I have been very remiss not to have thought of that before. I hope you will not take revenge on me by salting my coffe and serving up pebbles with my vegetables."

"No; I could not be content with so slight a vengeance."

And Erma swept from the room.

As Mr. Harris watched her receding form, he only wondered whether her beautiful eyes might not prove more torture to one's peace of mind than salt and pebbles to the stomach.

"Why did you introduce me as your daughter?" demanded Erma, when she found herself alone with Mrs. Webb.

"I thought girls were fond of such sport," replied the good old lady evasively.

"Well, perhaps I shall enjoy a masquerade; but it is surprising that you thought of it. I shall soon be found out, at any rate. Mr. Webb will be sure to say something."

"Perhaps not. Mr. Webb is nearly deaf you know, an' so taken up with his sullen spells that he don't take notice of anything goin' on around 'im."

Mrs. Webb did not think it politic to tell Erma that, having failed to secure a prize in the matrimonial market herself, she dreaded a similar fate for her favorite, and doubted not that Mr. Harris would be after her father's money should he become acquainted with her position in life. So she planned in her own way to save her darling from a possible calamity. Indeed, Mrs. Webb regarded marriage as a calamity under any circumstances.

Day followed day, week followed week, and yet Mr. Harris failed to make Erma his friend. He tried steadily to engage her in conversation; but she as often discovered that her floors were unswept or contrived some other trivial excuse for leaving him.

One morning Mr. Harris did not appear at the breakfast-table, and Mrs. Webb said he would not be able to teach that day, as he had been seized with a violent ague chill.

"I've a notion to substitute myself for him. I wonder if it wouldn't be fun to teach school just for one day," said Erma.

"I wish you would. The poor man can't afford to lose his situation. He needs the money, I believe."

"It isn't because I am very charitable, or in the least solicitous about pleasing him, that I propose going. My motive is evidently selfish. It is the novelty of being a country school-mistress that presents an irresistable charm to my mind."

Arrayed in a pretty walking costume, Erma knocked at the door of Mr. Harris's room to ask for the key to the school-house.

He surveyed her a moment in mute admiration—the only kind he dared offer.

"How tasteful she is in her dress!" he thought.

"You are very kind to take my place," he said at last, "and I am deeply grateful. I shall not require your aid long, if there is virtue in quinine. You will find the key on the table there under my hat. I hope that my pupils will not give you any trouble."

"Give yourself no uneasiness on my account, I might carry a bundle of rods with me if you think it probable that I shall need to defend myself," said she with an annihilating glance as she hurried away.

"I fervently hope I shall see or hear something to-day that will make me hate that man," remarked Erma to herself as she moved leisurely along the road. "The idea of allowing myself to fall in love with a poor teacher! It makes me angrier with myself than I am always pretending to be with poor Mr. Harris. There!" she exclaimed, as she neared the school-grounds; "I see something already! There's a pond of stagnant water behind the house. He ought to have the ague! And has no more sense than to be dosing himself with quinine. But, after all, it is his business to teach, not to drain marshes. I'll make him some hop tea to-night—no, I won't."

How anxious and sad the children seemed to learn that their teacher was not well, and how they all seemed to love him. Erma thought she should feel almost guilty if she could not love him too.

His solicitude for the welfare of his school led Mr. Harris to rise in the afternoon, when the fever had left him, and walk with slow, painful steps towards the scene of Erma's temporary sovereignty. He reached his destination in a state of great weariness, and sat down to rest awhile before going into the school-room.

A recitation was in progress, and he had not listened long to the sounds that were borne through the open doorway before he discovered that his pupils were being guided by a master-hand. To say that he was surprised would give but a tame idea of his emotions. Absorbed and delighted, forgetful of himself, he remained a listener until he was startled by hearing preparations for dismission. He entered just as the pupils were passing out. They gathered about him, eager to hear him say he was better, and as the last left him, Erma was about to go, too, with only a word or two about the key.

"Wait a moment, can you not? I would like to consult you about the record," said he.

When they were alone he said to her, "You have taught before?"

"Never!"

"Then you are a genius. But even if you are, you did not receive your education in a country school, did you?"

No reply, Erma turned with nervous haste to the register, and commenced talking about the day's attendance and punctuality.

As they turned the leaves together, they came upon the photograph of a sweet-faced woman, and a loose sheet of paper upon which was written a poem, with the title staring out in bold letters, "To my Love." Mr. Harris murmured something about his carelessness in leaving such things in such a place, and proceeded to place them in his coat-pocket; but Erma held out her hand.

"May I see the portrait?" she asked in a very faint voice.

"Certainly," he replied, handing it to her.

He noticed that her fingers shook as they closed over it, and that her face was a trifle pale.

"That is my sisters picture," said the school-master, after she had examined it carefully, watching her face intently as he spoke.

He saw a gleam of light leap into her eyes, and an expression of relief soften all the lines about her mouth. Then he took the hand that was still trembling in his own, looked into her eyes.

"Tell me," he said, "if it had been a sweetheart instead of a sister, should you have cared?"

"No. What are your sweethearts to me?" she said withdrawing her hand, and making a desperate effort to look out of the window; but somehow his gaze compelled her own, and she found herself lifting her eyes to his face, and dropping them in bewildered confusion before the light that met them.

"Erma," he said, "I feel that I must tell you what is in my heart. Nay, my darling, you shall listen,"—seizing her hands, for she was rising and turning from him. "I am too poor to marry, but poverty has not prevented me from loving, ay, worshipping you. Tell me, Erma, is there any hope for me? Can you ever learn to love me?"

"No," she replied, a quiver of happy excitement in her voice; "I shall never learn to love you, for I love you already."

His arms were about her in an instant.

"Bless you, my love, my love! Do you think we could live on a very small salary? But no; I was wrong to ask it. I must wait for you until I obtain a better position."

"I am sure we could live on a small salary. Let us try it. If it becomes necessary, I might teach, too," she added, mischievously.

When they reached home, Mr. Harris said, "Mrs. Webb, Erma and I are betrothed Will you accord your consent and blessing?"

"Blessing? No! Erma Weston, what'll yer father say? To think of my poor motherless Erma marryin' a man——"

"Motherless?" interrupted the astonished Mr. Harris.

"Yes," said Erma. "Mrs. Webb was my nurse, not my mother. We have deceived you, but you will forgive us,"—with a confident smile. "I am sure my father will consent to the marriage when he knows you."

He did consent, and even seemed pleased with Mr. Harris for having wooed Erma without knowing she would come into possession of a fortune on her twenty-first birthday. Mr. Harris would not marry until he had a better position; but Mr. Weston's influence helped him to obtain one, and his own industry enabled him to keep it.

Mr. Jonathan Bowers, of Blanchester, O., writes: "I am 72 years of age. I keep Dr. Scott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla always in the house. A dose now and then makes me feel like a boy. It gives me good appetite and keeps me from having dyspepsia."

Large Educational Gifts.

The body of the late Henry Seybert of Philadelphia, was cremated, recently, at Washington, Pa. Almost his entire estate, amounting to over a million dollars, has been left to educational and charitable institutions. The total number of bequests is 79, amounting to $245,000, the largest of which is $120,000 to the university of Pennsylvania for the endowment of a chair of mental and moral philosophy and the endowment of a ward in the wing for chronic diseases. The bequests are, according to the will, to be paid out of the income of the estate, so that it will take several years for the executors to pay them all, and the residue of the estate, which will, when all the above bequests are paid, amount to over a million dollars, is left in trust to the executors, to be used by them in the establishment of two similar institutions for the care and education of boys and girls respectively.

Biliousness and Bilious Patients.

Pertaining to Bile, Bilious Symptoms, Bilious Temperaments. THE REMEDY.

The Bilious is a disorder of the human system. A technical definition of the term is this: "Pertaining to the bile; disordered in respect to the bile; as a bilious patient; dependent on an excess of bile; as, bilious temperament; bilious symptoms.

The word bile, when employed in the sense in which it is to be understood in this article, signifies according to the dictionaries, "a yellow, greenish, bitter, viscid, nauseous fluid secreted by the liver." "Any derangement of the bile at once manifests itself in great bodily discomfort, in loss of appetite, and in despondency," recently remarked an author of a valuable treatise upon this subject.

The same writer further adds: "Some of the following symptoms are usually prominent: Pain in the right side, which is very sensitive to pressure. The pain will sometimes appear to be located under the shoulder blade. There is also irregular appetite, flatulence, a sense of fullness in the region of the stomach, and, sooner or later, the skin and whites of the eyes become yellow, the stools clay-colored and the urine yellow, depositing a copious sediment." The balance of the too familiar train of ills needs no further mention here. The bilious is, as will be seen, an affliction of great magnitude, and of varied forms of direct and indirect appearance. The disease is no respecter of persons or localities. Its deadly and implacable enemy is found in Kidney-Wort.

It acts on the liver and kidneys at the same time, and by its mild but efficient cathartic effects moves the bowels freely. The morbid poisons that have been the cause of all this disease and suffering will be thrown off; new life will be infused into every organ, and nature, thus aided, will soon restore the patient to health.

Physicians of repute and standing, men who are honored for their probity and respected and trusted for their scientific attainments, are using Kidney-Wort in their practice regularly. No stronger evidence of the worth of the remedy would seem to be necessary. Such endorsements are few and far between. We had almost said that they were without precedent in the history of a proprietary remedy. Be that as it may, however, the fact remains established that Kidney-Wort is a matchless remedy, and one that needs only to be tested to demonstrate its rare merit as a healer of most of the common maladies of the human family.

Dr. Phillip C. Ballou

lives in Monkton, Vt. Under date of April 30th, 1882, the doctor wrote to the proprietors of Kidney-Wort, and said, among other things: "Nearly a year ago I wrote you about the success I had had in the use of Kidney-Wort in my practice. The past year I have used it more than ever, [illegible] Mr. Silas Lawrence, of this town, [illegible] of a terrible case of bloated kidney disorder. [illegible] many other diseases successfully [illegible] Kidney-Wort [illegible] Georgia, says [illegible] "Kidney-Wort does all that is claimed for it." [illegible]

Excessive Doses of Opium.

On one occasion during my temporary absence from the prescription counter he seized the opportunity to swallow two ounces, or four tablespoonfuls at a single draught. He refused and laughed at all emetics. I anxiously awaited the result, but no alarming effects followed. The usual dose for an adult is about 40 drops, for a boy of 12, 15 drops—25 drops containing 1 grain of opium, and four grains frequently proving fatal. A tablespoon contains about 400 drops, so this boy actually drank 1,600 drops, or forty times the regular dose for an adult, and sufficient to kill twenty-five boys unaccustomed to its use. His sister, six years old, received 300 drops daily, and her brother 1,200 daily, probably as negative food, for no boy can sleep and eat at the same time. Still its effects are not always so frightful as is generally imagined. I know of an old woman aged 70 years who takes about three ounces—six tablespoonfuls—daily (2,400 drops). She has been indulging for the past forty-five years and still pursues her vocation, which is scrubbing from morning till night, with no apparent diminution of strength.—Phila. Times.

Couldn't Be Bought.

England's wealthiest baronet is said to be Sir John Ramsder, of Byram, Yorkshire. His rent-roll is computed at $850,000 a year. He owns almost the whole of Huddersfield, the great manufacturing center. The little bit he doesn't own was a very Naboth's vineyard to his father, who, according to the tradition once offered to its Quaker owner to cover it with sovereigns he would sell it. "Edgewise, friend Ramsden?" quoth the Quaker; "in that case it is thine; otherwise all Huddersfield must still belong to thee and me." "Edgewise" was rather more than the baronet could swallow.

A New York doctor says the best cure he knows of for a cold is the old-fashioned sweat. Take ten grains of quinine, a hot mustard foot bath, and a stiff glass of toddy—or, rather, I should say, a hot lemonade.

no longer from Dyspepsia, Indigestion, want of Appetite, loss of Strength lack of Energy, Malaria, Intermittent Fevers, &c. BROWN'S IRON BITTERS never fails to cure all these diseases.

Boston, November 26, 1881.
BROWN CHEMICAL CO.
Gentlemen:—For years I have been a great sufferer from Dyspepsia, and could get no relief (having tried everything which was recommended) until, acting on the advice of a friend, who had been benefitted by BROWN'S IRON BITTERS, I tried a bottle, with most surprising results. Previous to taking BROWN'S IRON BITTERS, everything I ate distressed me, and I suffered greatly from a burning sensation in the stomach, which was unbearable. Since taking BROWN'S IRON BITTERS, all my troubles are at an end. Can eat any time without any disagreeable results. I am practically another person. Mrs. W. J. FLYNN, 39 Maverick St., E. Boston.

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS acts like a charm on the digestive organs, removing all dyspeptic symptoms, such as tasting the food, Belching, Heat in the Stomach, Heartburn, etc. The only Iron Preparation that will not blacken the teeth or give headache.

A Life Doubly Assured.

A resident of Bangor, Maine, mentions incidentally that three months ago a New England life-insurance company refused to grant him a policy on the ground that he was consumptive. "But," he adds, "thanks to the healing properties of Hales Honey of Horehound and Tar, my lungs are now perfectly sound, and I yesterday passed a medical examination, without any objection being made, and insured my life for $5,000." Preventive of Malarial Disease.

Opinion of Eminent Dr. H. R. Walton, of Annapolis, Md.

"Colden's Liquid Beef Tonic is a most excellent preparation. It is, par excellence, superior to cod-liver oil or anything I have ever used in wasted or impaired constitutions, and extremely beneficial as a preventive of malarial diseases." (Remember the name, Colden's—take another.) Of druggists generally.

Rescued from Death.

William J. Coughlin, of Somerville, Mass., says: In the fall of 1876, I was taken with bleeding of lungs followed by a severe cough. I lost my appetite and flesh, and was confined to my bed. In 1877 I was admitted to the hospital. The doctors said I had a hole in my lung as big as a half dollar. At one time a report went around that I was dead. I gave up hope, but a friend told me of Dr. William Hall's Balsam for the lungs. I got a bottle, when to my surprise, I commenced to feel better, and to-day I feel better than for three years past.

Another Physician's Testimony.

BOSTON, Mass., May 9, 1881.

I know parties who have tried all kinds of medicines for Lung Diseases, who say that Dr. William Hall's Balsam for the Lungs, is a complete success. DR. CHAS. H. WOOD.

"The Life That Now is."

Robert Collyer Last Sunday.

"The enduring nature of this human life is most remarkable. I know of families in England who have held the same fireside for 700 years. A branch of a Scotch family living in a Lammermoor vale emigrated to Nova Scotia two hundred years ago. Not long ago a descendant of that branch hunted up his ancestry, found where the old family nest was, went there, and while crossing the moor was taken by the children of the house for "Uncle John," who lived in the neighborhood and who was a descendant of the branch that didn't emigrate. It is wonderful to track these deep, enduring lines of human life across the centuries. We can impart that immortal quality to our posterity if we live clean, wholesome lives. Gluttons do not possess it nor impart it. Those who live impure lives, those who waste body and mind in excesses which they call pleasures, they do not possess it. The old countries are filled with noble names that have been lost and the laborers' sons have risen up to take the places of the nobility because their lives were strong and clean and because they put virtue out at compound interest. But there is a nobler fatherhood and motherhood, that which lives in long lines of ancestry. It is the spiritual fatherhood which gives Luther and Milton and Cromwell and Washington spiritual sons in thousands of families. We may not be able to do as much as the great heroes for the human life that is so enduring, but if we are really alive ourselves spiritually, and impart that life to others, if we are constantly doing acts of generosity and kindness to those about us, we will do silently but surely a grand work for this true, deep, inspiring, abiding, enobling human life. Then all will come out at last like sowing time and harvest, like rain in rich garden and blossoming flowers, like the opening of shutters in a sick room, like the presence of God."

Keeping Warm In The Far North.

I reached home on the 13th, the coldest weather I experienced on the trip being on the 13th, when, about two hours before sunrise, the thermometer indicated fifty degrees below zero. That day I made a journey of twenty-five miles, riding most of the way on the sledge, and at no time during that day did I feel uncomfortable, the highest the thermometer reached being fifty degrees, and I might here say that I really enjoyed the whole trip. I attribute this almost wholly to the Esquimau reindeer clothing and constant living in a snow igloo like the natives, where the temperature is never above freezing and generally ten to fifteen degrees below that point. I do not believe—and my belief is confirmed by the written accounts of others—that any Arctic voyagers, housed in warm ships at their base and clad in the usual Arctic suits of explorers, could stand such a journey without more or less material discomfort. Only once did I learn the lesson of caution. I took off my right mitten in attempting to get a shot at a passing reindeer, the wind blowing stiffly in my face, and the thermometer thirty-seven degrees below zero, when the persistent refusal of the frozen gun-lock to work perfectly kept my hand exposed much longer than I had intended. When I attempted to use it again it seemed paralyzed, and looking at it I noticed that the skin was as white as marble. Toolooah, who was beside me, noticed it at the same time, and with an Innuit exclamation of surprise, hastily doffing both his mittens, grasped it between his warm hands, and held it against his warmer body under his coo-le-tah, or Esquimaux coat. It soon resumed its functions, and although I felt for some time as though I was holding on to a hornet's nest, I experienced no more serious results than a couple of ugly-looking blisters where the iron of the gun had come in contact with the bare hand. The reindeer escaped. As the reindeer clothing is the warmest in the Arctic, so it makes the warmest bedding, two large skins made into a long, coffin-like bag or sack, the hair side in, being a sufficient protection in the coldest weather when in a properly constructed igloo. When the first severe cold came at North Hudson Bay I was sleeping under a blanket and two fine buffalo robes, which I found, as the thermometer sunk thirty to forty degrees below zero, Fahrenheit, to be inadequate to secure comfort, until I secured a reindeer sleeping-bag, weighing not half as much, after which cold nights were no longer dreaded. The robe of the American bison seems under the least provocation to become damp; and then freezes as stiff as a piece of sole-leather. Once spoiled in this manner, it is difficult to dry it and restore it to its former pliability in the low temperature of an igloo. The furs of the beaver and muskrat I found to be equally unsuitable in our mode of life, and I believe that all the other furs of the temperate zone would have shared the same opinion if tested in the same practical way.—Lieut. Schwatka.

Miscellaneous Matters.

Hungary will shortly celebrate the millenary of her foundation as an independent state. The Academy of Sciences at Pesth, at the request of the minister of public instruction, instituted an inquiry into the approximate date required; but the learned body could only conclude that the Hungarians made their appearance in history after the year 883, and before 900. It therefore proposes that the academy should fix upon the interval of twelve years as the real period of the foundation of the monarchy.

A singular alliance has been formed in Belgium between alcohol and education. An almsbox for the secular schools is a recognized feature of every place where liquor is sold, and every customer drops into it his sou as regularly as he fees his waiter. A school building costing $400,000 has just been built from the sous thus collected. The same plan is on trial in France, but at present without much success, though M. Sarcey thinks that it has a great future.

How the times have changed since Henry Clay was speaker of the House. Mr. Daniel Dougherty, of Philadelphia, commenting on the recent undignified behavior of the House of Representatives, said to a friend that, when Mr. Clay was Speaker, if he saw a member of the House reading a newspaper while the House was in session, he would send a page to him with instructions to say: "The Speaker presents his compliments, and wishes to call your attention to the fact that the House is in session."

A New York correspondent writes of the weather as follows: "Well, Wiggins' storm has not yet drowned us out. It has been just ordinary rough March weather. We have had the most disagreeable Winter ever known in New York. It stormed twenty-seven days in January. Had there been thirty-one days in February, no doubt it would have stormed twenty-seven of them. I think we had four pleasant days in the twenty-eight."

Fifty women are enrolled as regular students in Cornell University, and there are others who are pursuing a post-graduate course. A correspondent of the Philadelphia Press has been visiting the university, and says in regard to this matter, "I have talked with men and women students and with such as are not students, and the general verdict is that there is no question whatever as to the success of co-education. It operates as naturally, healthfully and as much to the positive benefit of both sexes, as can the best and most elevating social relations. The men and women behave better and are more self-respecting than when educated in one-sex schools.

The Scientific American says that the largest arch of masonry in the world, an arch which forms part of one of the most important engineering achievements of recent years—is that of the aqueduct by which the city of Washington is supplied with water. This has a span of 220 feet, is 101 feet high and 20 wide, and forms an arc of a circular having a radius of 134,286 feet. When the arch (unlike all other work of the kind) did not settle, the keystone having been set in winter and the center struck in summer. The other notable masonry arches of the world are the Chester arch across the river Dee, at Chester, England, with a span of 200 feet; the famous center arch of the New London Bridge over the Thames, with a span of 152 feet; Poolty-Prydd over the Taff, in Wales, 140 feet; the bridge across the Seine, at Nenilly, France, with five span each of 128 feet; the nine span of the Waterloo Bridge London, each 120 feet; and the celebrated marble Rialto Bridge in Venice, with a span of 98 1-2 feet.

Col. Higginson thinks that George Eliot, if she had ever held a dead babe in her arms, would have wanted something more to console her than the philosophy of Herbert Spencer.

Dr. Holmes finds that "Old Probabilities" was anticipated by Lucian's Jupiter, who according to Burton, spent much of the year, among other occupations, in "telling the hours it should rain, how much snow should fall in such a place, which way the wind should stand in Greece, which way in Africk."

Napoleon and the Boy Guide.

A Scrap of History.

It was in May, 1800, when Napoleon's army started to cross the Alps, that Ulrici—a sturdy, fearless boy-mountaineer, who knew every chasm and ravine for miles around—was about to make his third trip up the Alps.

His former severe lessons had taught him prudence without fear, courage without recklessness, and for this, as his knowledge of the mountain passes, he had been offered numerous positions, both as guide and herdsman, though he had scarcely reached his seventeenth year.

He had already promised his services to one Yokli, a herdsman, and they were to start for the Alps in a few days when his mother suddenly fell ill, and Ulrici, relieving his sister in her long night-watches, immediately informed the senner of his inability to keep his engagement.

Senner Yokli, knowing that guides were in great demand, and that Napoleon had offered large sums of money to any one who would assist in conveying his ponderous cannon across the mountains, and suspecting that Ulrici was only making an excuse for breaking his engagement for some such purpose, flew into a rage, in which he dealt with no choice language.

And when Ulrici promised to send him another boy in his place, he coolly turned his back on him, and said that he could find plenty of vagabonds himself.

Though pained and indignant at this suspicion from a former employer, when, after two weeks of faithful attendance, his mother had fully recovered her health, he began to consider whether it was not his duty, even now, to fulfil his engagement.

True, Senner Yokli might have secured an assistant, and he would be running the risk of the loss of another week in traversing that long distance, up and down the Alps.

But, after all, his employer only spoke in a fit of temper, he thought, and he remembrance of Yokli's kindness and anxiety for him once when he was in danger decided his wavering mind. He would go and do what he thought was right.

Fully equipped with his flask, Alp-horn, a handkerchief full of eatables, he planted his Alp-stick firmly on the rocks, and was about to ascend, when a mule, bearing a rather short, thick-set, but graceful rider, galloped close up to him and halted.

"My friend, are you a guide? Do you know anything about the mountain passes?" inquired the stranger, hurriedly.

"Yes, sir; I am on my way up now, and will be glad to guide you."

A look of satis faction and relief swept over the stern face of the stranger as Ulrici promptly took hold of the mule's bridle and strode out for the mountains.

After a few more inquiries and replies between them, they both seemed to be very much interested in each other.

The quiet reserve of the unknown rider and the lofty dignity of his whole manner, had a strange fascination for the young boy-guide.

And the stern face of the stranger lost some of its severity as he listened to the boy's quaint narratives of Alpine adventures, and observed with what care he led his mule up the rocky steep and past the precipices which yawned close beside them.

He seemed affected by the artlessness with which the youth related his past life, and described, in glowing ardor, his plans and hopes for the future.

After considerable stumbling, Ulrici began to look about for Yokli's herd, which he knew must be in that vicinity.

He soon met them with Yokli in their midst. But his heart sank within him as he saw the dark scowl which Yokli cast at him, and then disappeared behind the rocks without the usual friendly salute.

Ulrici suddenly realized his unpleasant situation. Here he was, just as Yokli had suspected, guiding a traveller across the Alps, and leaving his old employer to look out for himself.

He strode on in silence, perplexed and provoked at his own good nature, which led him into the blunder.

His best intentions were perverted by appearances, for Yokli would never believe that he was on the way to him when he met the stranger, and that he simply guided him because it was on his way.

They had scarcely travelled a quarter of a mile, when Ulrici suddenly stopped the mule and listened.

Alarm-notes, faint and broken as though coming from one unused to the Alp-horn, reached his ear.

Quickly leading the mule to a safe standing-point, and assuring the stranger that he would return in a few moments, he climbed the highest peak, in order to obtain a view of the surroundings.

The blue veins on his temples swelled high with indignation, as he saw, on the other side, a man forcibly driving a calf before him; while the old cow, whose burnt mark on her back Ulrici at once recognized as Yokli's, was plodding on behind lowing piteously.

"Eric! Eric! come back; I'll help you get the cattle!" Ulrici shouted after the terrified and evidently new senner-boy, who was making his escape over the mountains.

In another instant Ulrici had glided down the steep, and freed the calf from the robbers hold with a heavy blow of his Alp-stick.

"Now drive them home, Eric—quick!" he cried, as he saw the robber raise his rifle with an angry glare.

"I belong to Napoleon's army, and can shoot you on the spot for attacking me," threatened the thief.

"I belong to the Swiss Republic, and can thrash you on the spot for attacking Swiss prpoerty" promptly retorted Ulrici.

"Thrash me! An ignorant young rustic like you thrash a soldier? Ha! Ha!"

"You are no more soldier than I am. I know well enough that you would not dare to leave the ranks without being hunted as a deserter. You have more likely followed the army as a vagabond and thief."

With this Ulrici stooped low, and before the man was aware of his intentions, knocked the rifle from his grasp down a precipice.

A fearful struggle now ensued. One instant they were rolling on the ground, locked in each other's grasp; the next they again rose, and Ulrici, in spite of his desperate resistance, felt himself gradually pushing toward a yawning chasm.

Could the man really intend such a horrible fate for him? He measured the width of the chasm with a hasty glance. Yes, he might baffle him yet.

He allowed himself to be pushed close to the brink. Then, as his adversary loosened his grasp to let him sink down, he dexterously turned and leaped across the chasm; and, in an instant, while his enemy stood in open-mouthed amazement on the opposite side, he turned and recrossed it, and rushed between the limbs of his opponent, and upset him, face downward.

He next tied his hands with a strong twine, which he always carried with him, and not knowing what had become of his Alp-stick, he took his horn from his side and belabored him so soundly that in a few moments it was battered and bent like a reed in his hands.

"Now," said Ulrici, as he was about to let him run with his hands tied behind him, "go, and tell General Napoleon that you got a thrashing from a senner boy for stealing his cattle; and that I said, if his justice is as great as his name, he will order another thrashing for you!"

Ulrici now continued his journey across the mountains without any more interruption.

He briefly related to the waiting traveller what had happened, though he suspected that he had partly witnessed the scene from the fact that the stranger had dismounted and was a short distance from his mule when he arrived.

His suspicion was confirmed when about to separate at the foot of the last mountain, the traveller, with a deep, searching gaze on the young mountaineer, said:

"I have heard your remarks about Napoleon to-day. You are a brave fellow. With an army such as you, he could conquer the world!"

He then wrote on a loose piece of paper, and handed it to Ulrici, with the request to give it to the Administrator of the Army on his return, he galloped away.

Unfortunately like all poor peasants, Ulrici had never learned to read, and, as he turned the paper over in his hands wondering what it all meant, he began to realize the advantage of an education, and resolved to learn to read himself.

He lost no time in reaching Yokli's hut; and, after a long explanation from Ulrici, and profuse apologies from Yokli, who allowed that he was the best boy in Switzerland, he produced the mysterious slip of paper for Yokli's perusal.

Yokli slowly adjusted his spectacles and read and re-read the paper. Then suddenly bringing his fist down upon the table with a tremendous noise, he exclaimed:

"Boy you've seen the greatest general of the age—Napoleon! And mind, Uli," he added, "he's ordered enough money to be paid to you for a house and field."

Ulrici was almost struck dumb with amazement.

"Napoleon? That little silent man, who listened so patiently to my simple talk, and smiled whenever I spoke of the house and meadow I wanted to buy?" he exclaimed, scarcely crediting his hearing.

"There is his name, black on white," laughed Yokli, as he spelled it. "I suppose I won't have you for senner-boy, after all."

But Ulrici's mind was made up differently.

He went down to the valley to get Napoleon's order cashed and placed it in the bank. Then he bought a few school-books and some candles, and ascended the mountains once more.

"Now, Yokli," he said, as he entered the hut; "I'll take care of your cattle for this season, as I promised, if you'll sit down with me in the evening and help me learn to read. I'm going to make myself worthy of Napoleon's money before I use it."

As Ulrici sat on the greensward in the midst of his cattle, poring over his school-book, he felt that a new world—a world of knowledge—was opening to him.

Years after, when he had cattle of his own in the Alps, he often read of himself, in Napoleon's history, as a young peasant who unknowingly led the great general across the mountains.

Ben Finally Succumbed to What?

"Speaking of army ways," said Fogg, "there was old Ben Plunckard, as brave a chap as ever drew bead on a fellow mortal, and as true as steal. You could always depend upon Ben. Did I ever tell you about that time he was on picket? No? Well d'ye see, it was down in front of Fredericksburg, an awful night—black as a stack of black cats, and raining like fun. Ben was walking back and forth wet to the skin and almost dead for sleep, when he thought he heard something. Ben pricked up his ears and strained his eyeballs. He couldn't see or hear anything at first, but bineby he heard a footstep, and in another instant the unmistakable outline of a man loomed out of the mist and darkness. Ben brought his piece down with a jerk, and hollered out: 'Who goes there?' 'Friend!' came the answer. Ben demanded the countersign, but the man didn't have it. He said he was Ben's captain, and that he had been visiting another regiment, and got belated. Ben knew the voice well enough, but Ben was a true soldier, he was. 'No use,' he said; 'I've got my orders; and orders is orders. You can't pass; and if yer don't get out pooty darn quick, I'll give yer a taste o' the bayonet.' 'Nonsense, Ben,' said the captain, kind o' trembling like, for he knew what kind o' stuff Ben was made of, 'let me get into camp; I'm wet as a drowned rat.' But Ben wasn't to be coaxed, and when the captain heard the click of Ben's musket, he began to think it was about time to say his prayers. But he made one more appeal. 'Ben,' he whispered, 'don't make a fool of yourself. I've got a canteen of whisky—' Before he could say more, Ben brought up his piece to the carry, with the words: 'Countersign is right; advance, friend!' Yes," continued Fogg, "old Ben was a soldier every inch of him; clean grit clear through."—Boston Transcript.

A Reminiscence of Parepa Rosa.

The season of music was closing. Satiated with praise Parepa Rosa drew her fur wrap around her shoulders, and stepping from the private entrance of the "Grand" was about to enter the carriage when "please mi ladi," in low pleading accents, arrested her attention. It was only the shrunken, mishappen form of little Elfin, the Italian street-singer, with his old violin under his arm; but the face upturned in the gas-light, though pale and pinched, was as delicately cut as a cameo, while the eager, wistful light in the great brilliant eyes, the quiver of entreaty in the soft Italian voice held her for a moment against her escort's endeavor to save the annoyance of hearing a beggar's plea.

"Well," said the great singer, half impatient, yet full of pity.

"Would mi ladi please?" in sweet broken English, and the slender brown hands of the dwarf held up a fragrant white lily, with a crystal drop in its golden heart.

"Do you mean this lovely flower for me?" A passionate gesture was his answer. Taking the flower, Parepa Rosa bent her stately head. "You heard me sing?"

"Mi ladi, I hid under the stair. 'Twas yesterday I heard the voice. Oh, mi ladi, mi ladi, I could die!" The words came brokenly from quivering lips, passionately in earnest. The loud voice of the world she had just left had never shown Parepa Rosa the power of her grand voice as she saw it now in these soft, dark eyes aflame, and in the sobbing, broken words, "Mi ladi, oh! mi ladi—I could die."

"Child," and her voice trembled, "meet me here to-morrow at 5" and holding the lily caressingly to her cheek, she stepped into her carriage and was driven away.

It was Parepa Rosa's last night. In a box near the stage sat little Elfin, like one entranced. Grandly the clear voice swelled its triumphant chords, and rang amid the arches with unearthly power and sweetness. The slight frame of the boy swayed and shook, and a look so rapt, so intense, came on his face, you knew his very heart was stilled. Then the wondrous voice thrilled softly, like the faint sound of bugles in the early morn; again its sweetness stole over you like the distant chimes of vesper bells. Encore after encore followed. The curtain rolled up for the last time, and as simply as possible the manager told the audience of last night's incident and announced that Parepa Rosa's farewell to them would be the simple ballad warbled many a bitter day through the city streets by little Elfin, the Italian musician.

Long and prolonged was the applause and at the first pause, sweeping in with royal grace, came our queen of song. At her breast was the fragrant lily. Queen, too, by right of her beautiful womanhood as well as by the power of her sublime voice, she stood a moment: then sang clearly and softly the ballad with its refrain of "Farewell, sweet land." Accompanying her came the low, sweet wails of little Elfin's violin. There was silence in that great house at the close, then a shout went up that shook the mighty pillars.

A whisper being heard that Parepa Rosa meant to educate the boy musically, the generous hearts of a few opened the gates of fortune for little Elfin. To-day he is great and famous, "the boy violinist," and they call him to play before princes.

Parepa Rosa! God called thee in thy perfect womanhood, but thy voice lives in our hearts, and at the last great day it shall be written in shining letters on thy name: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, ye did it unto me."

Warming Heart and Hand.

Some time since a beautiful young girl made her first appearance on the stage in one of the minor theaters of Paris. Her grace and loveliness attracted admiration, which her rising talent promised to secure. She concluded a long engagement with the manager, giving her services for a moderate remuneration, but which sufficed for her wants and those of an invalid mother, who was totally dependent upon her exertions. According to the usual custom a clause in the contract stipulated that a forfeit of 10,000 francs should be paid in case of its non-fulfillment by either party.

One day the young actress entered the manager's room, and announced to him that she wished to leave."

"How!" he cried. "You are the last person from whom I would have expected such caprice."

"Indeed, sir, it is not caprice."

"It is, then, the offer of another engagement?"

"It is, sir, and one which I cannot refuse. It is from an excellent young man, who wishes to marry me."

"My dear girl, I shall want you also to study your part in a new afterpiece which I have just received."

"Then, sir, you refuse to set me free?"

"I must think about it. At all events you have it in your power to break the agreement by paying the forfeit."

"Ten thousand francs! 'tis very dear."

"It was very dear when you signed your name: but your services are worth more than that."

"Alas, it will prevent our marriage!" said the unhappy girl, in a voice choked with tears; and with a despairing heart she left the room.

Two days afterward the manager was seated close to the grate in his apartment, trying with all his skill to kindle a fire.

The cashier entered with a visage woefully elongated. The affairs of the theater were in a critical state; the receipts had diminished; and the pay-day at the end of the month approached.

"Yes," said the manager, "our situation is embarrassing. And this plaguy fire that won't light!"

Astonished that he could be so indifferent under the circumstances, the cashier retired. As he was leaving the room the young actress entered.

"Ah! is it you?" said the manager; "you are coming from rehearsal?"

"No, sir, I have come to return the part you gave me to study."

"So it seems you think of quitting the stage?"

"I have brought you the forfeit."

"The ten thousand francs?"

"Here they are."

"And how have you procured this large sum?"

"My intended husband gave it to me."

"Is he, then, so rich?"

"These ten thousand francs are nearly all he possessed. "But," he said, "what does it signify?" We shall only have to defer setting up in business, or perhaps I may succeed in borrowing the money."

"Going in debt! That's a fine prospect for young housekeepers! So the dowry you mean to bring your husband is want and ruin; you take from his industry, and you oblige him to renounce the prospect of honorable independence!"

"Pray, sir—don't speak so cruelly!" sobbed the young girl.

"Have you considered that such a union cannot fail to be unhappy! Listen to reason—take back this money and return it to him who gave it to you; and if you are absolutely resolved to leave the theater, I'll show you a simple way of doing it that won't cost you anything. Take this paper and have the kindness to put it in the grate."

So saying he handed her a sheet of paper which she threw in among the smouldering sticks.

The manager watched it as the languid flame gradually curled around it, and then shot up in a bright flame.

"Do you know," said he "what that paper was? It was your signed agreement. And now I have no longer any claim on your services, and consequently can demand no forfeit. Go, my girl, and employ your little capital well, and be happy."

Deeply affected by this generous deed this young actress expressed her gratitude as fervently as her tears permitted.

"Don't talk to me of gratitude," replied the manager, "we are only quits. See, for the last hour I have been blowing in vain at that obstinate fire; you threw your engagements into it, and it instantly blazed up. Thanks to me you are free; thanks to you I am giving my hands a good warming."—Chicago News Letter.

An Experience of Wagner's.

A little adventure which once cost the music composer, Wagner, lately deceased a bad ducking, illustrates the precarious footing on which favorites stand with a sovereign highly sensitive to his dignity. A water party by moonlight had been organized on the lake near King Louis' summer palace, and a celebrated prima donna had been invited to sing some of the duets from "Tristan and Isolde," with the king. Wagner, in his fancy dress, and a page, who sculled, completed the quartette in the royal boat. It was all very poetical, and the lady, carried away by the romance of the occasion, made so bold as to administer a gentle caress to the king, who resented this breach of etiquette by a push which sent her overboard. Wagner plunged in after the soprano, whose tuneful voice was being raised with rare force, and succeeded in rescuing her; but it was a doleful party that presently stepped ashore—Isolde sobbing and wringing out her clothes, the meistersinger creaking in his shoes, Tristan murmuring as he stalked away with an injured air, and the page, no doubt, laughing in his sleeve after the manner of his irreverent kind.

Over production of cotton is the complaint at the south, and the people are earnestly urged by newspapers to raise more hog and hominy and food products.

HOUSE AND FARM.

Agricultural Items.

Indian corn is now becoming a general article of food on the other side of the Atlantic, more than ever before, and its consumption is likely to increase largely.

On an estate near Cheltenham, England, 500 acres have been planted to fruit, from gooseberries (93,000, and currants (167,000) to apples, damsons and other plums (60,000), all for prospective jam, and all sheltered by 10,000 poplar trees.

A cow that does not chew the cud, and vomits her food, is suffering from indigestion. The remedy is to give a brisk purgative, as a quart of linseed-oil followed by moderate feed of bran slop and very little other food for two or three days. As soon as the stomach has rested and gained strength moderate feeds of cut hay, with bran or middlings, and a little fine meal, may be given but the feed should be light and good.

Professor J. P. Steele, who has for years opposed the use of government funds in behalf of what he is pleased to call "This carp farce," considers the subject anew to the extent of two columns of a recent issue of the Mobile Register. He likens the scaly German to the buffalo of the Ohio river, "the meanest fish of those waters; a nasty, grisly fleshed kind of mudsucker, which digs in the muck and feeds on decaying substances. This aquatic buzzard extensively advertised as 'delicious carp,' the surpassingly magnificent aquatic poultry of the farmer."

Plant grape-vines against the sunny side of barns, wagon-sheds, carriage-houses, well-houses, chicken-houses, or any other outbuildings. Do not delay pruning grape-vines. Make new strawberry beds. Spring is the best time for this. Set the plants a foot apart; the rows from two to three feet, as we propose to form matted rows or confine to hills. Blackberries and raspberries may be set at once if the frost is out of the ground. Provide strong stakes not less than five feet high to each. Prune currants by cutting out a part of the old wood. Do not prune too severely.

Painted Dresses.

Among the earliest painted dresses to attract attention in New York were several which were worn by Miss Fanny Davenport. Since then many actresses have worn painted dresses, generally the work of artist friends. Mary Anderson has had a number of painted costumes. One black velvet and white satin, having the appearance of embossing, was painted for her by Miss Louise Brudie, of Syracuse. Miss Cora Tanner, who recently appeared in "Ovette" at the Park Theater, Brooklyn, had two painted dresses which attracted attention. One was a train dress, made up without lace, of blue satin, on which were painted scarlet poppies, golden-rod, cat-tails and wild leaves that covered the entire front. The second dress was a pink surah satin with painted panels, on which was one large bunch of peonies, the bough of an old tree, and two large bluebirds. They were painted by Miss Georgie Lamson, of Brooklyn. Miss Rosa Kerone who played "Dora" in the "Planter's Wife," had a black velvet dress painted in the same manner by Miss Lamson. Miss Laura Donn has worn several stage dresses painted by herself in water colors. One was painted on the back of the waist, and the other on the lower part of the skirt. Most painted dresses however, have been done in oil, as water colors have been found to fade. Artists claim that the embroidery work lacks accuracy both of form and color, and is altogether inadequate to give the delicate tints, the proper shades, or the finely turned curves of vines and tendrils.

No Trouble in Churning.

I never have any except it comes too soon (by allowing the cream to get too warm). I do not consider an hour, in winter, too long to churn the cream thoroughly; if mine is churned too quickly the whole of the cream is not seperated from the buttermilk and so does not become butter. I churn twice a week, but the cream is so sour I frequently add soda to correct the acidity, which is caused by setting in a warm room. When the cream thickens so the dash will not move easily I pour in a pint of warm water, a little more than blood warm, if it also foams, if not, not so warm, (I have no thermometer); this will thin the cream; if it thickens again, as it most likely will, I add another pint. I continue this treatment until it ceases to thicken and butter will soon come. If you throw a small handful of fine salt into the first skimming and so on into every subsequent one, and thoroughly stir up the cream every time, it will facilitate the churning process very much. Don't churn any cream which has not been skimmed twelve hours. I don't think the feed affects the churning; it is all in caring for and tempering the cream from the time it is milked until it is churned. I scald all my milk when it is fresh from the cows, and set it in shallow pans not over two inches deep.—New Hampshire Household.

Setting out Plants.

In setting out flowering plants in the open border that have brightened our homes during the inclement months and that are in the full beauty of opening buds, it may be well to anticipate the time when we shall again be preparing them for window culture. To have plants that shall bloom from early autumn through winter is the point to be considered. I have found the best way to do this is to take off small branches that have started from the lower part of the main stalk of the parent plant, and setting them in a saucer of wet sand, place the saucer in the strong sunshine, until the tiny, white roots have started. Then set them in two-inch pots filled with prepared soil. As I am speaking almost exclusively of geraniums, I would say that the soil needed for them should be strong. Leaf mold and river sand or broken charcoal, in about one-third proportion to two-thirds of well-rotted sods, or earth from about fences, will be what you will want. When first planted give them one generous watering with topid water, and for five or six weeks after they will need only a small supply of water, but do not let them droop. When the leaves are beginning to start they will need watering more freely. Keep them in the sun part of the day. Early in September repot, giving them an inch larger pot, but without disturbing them in the least. Fill the pot up with fresh soil and give a sunny situation with plenty of heat and a moderate supply of water, and you will be rewarded with profuse bloom all winter.—Aunt Addie.

Straw for Fattening Stock.

Few farmers realize the value of good, properly cut, cured and housed straw as feed for farm stock. It will pay to build barns purposely to house it, for, well cared for, it is worth half as much as timothy hay, ton for ton. Any kind of fattening animals if highly fed on rich foods crave and will eat large quantities of straw, especially if bright, well cured and housed. I each winter feed a lot of young farrow cows, milking and fattening them at the same time, and, of course, I feed high. They get all the oil meal, bran, corn meal, good bright hay, and all the mangels they can eat. Once a day their mangers are filled with bright, barn housed straw, of which they eat what they like, the remainder to be used as bedding. We find the cows always waiting for their straw ration, and often they eat it so completely that we have to throw in extra straw for bedding, and we find it as necessary for their health and fattening as any one thing. I commend this plan to Mr. Ault of Pennsylvania, who asks about the advisability of spreading straw on new ground and burning it for wheat. That course would waste other vegetable matter on the field, and leave only ashes, and these he could get, though less rapidly, by scattering the straw on the surface to be turned under. If this land, being new, is rough, and he wishes to further subdue and level it, I can see no better way than to plough as soon as the crop is off, giving plenty and thorough cultivation, and resow to wheat before reseeding to grass; but by all means he should carefully save and take the straw to the barn to be used in the stables and yard.

Curiosities of Seed Corn.

Mr. S. F. Gooding, of Illinois, writes: "One great objeciton to tip and butt kernels is, they are smaller than the middle kernels, and in planting with a machine, as we all do out west, it would drop too many in a hill. To have corn well filled out at both ends is, I think, more dependent on season and soil than on planting of tips and butts. I am satisfied that flint corn will do to cut in a greener state than dent corn. The flint begins to ripen on the outside of the kernel and the dent at the cob. Farmers had better test their seed corn, for I think that exposure to 20 deg. or 25 deg. below zero, unless it is perfectly dry, will destroy the germs." It is probably true, as your correspondent suggests that the season has something to do with the filling out of the ear, as well as the seed used. He is also right in his statement that flint corn will germinate better when harvested rather green than will the dents.

Mingling Stock.

Speaking of mingling stock, the National Farmer remarks: "Stock, to be perfectly healthy, must have an opportunity of mingling with other living things of various kinds. The old idea of the healthy effect goats have upon stabled horses is only one phase of a great truth, that it takes the emanations of all active life to perfect every other life. Cattle should be pastured near or in conjunction with hogs and horses. The action of one upon the other is always beneficial; and the young, playful and sociable always make friends with each other, in such a way that much future inconvenience may be spared the owner. Put sheep and young cattle together, and each will grow in strength one-third faster. Put horses and goats or even young cattle in the same lot, and each will grow the better—will feed easier, and will grow up with finer results. Whenever the natural instincts, of domestic animals can have play, they tend to confidence and a general affection for all living forms. A cat is the only thing which loves no other animal; if it endures them, it is a stretch of magnanimity which actually contradicts its honest nature.

The Tomato Crop.

As no record is kept of the thousands of bushels of tomatoes raised in private gardens, or those grown by gardeners for market, and consumed in our cities and villages, it would be difficult to give anything like a correct estimate of the total number of bushels produced annually in the United States. But the canning establishments keep an account of the number of cans of tomatoes put up each year, and from this we can get an idea of the constantly increasing demand for this healthful fruit. This is especially noticable in the demand for canned tomatoes, and the pack in 1882 was nearly or quite double that of 1880. The American Grocer says that the total pack of 1882 is 52,321,952 cans of tomatoes, and yet this enormous number gives only one can per annum for each individual in the United States. There is certainly room for considerable expansion before our people have more canned tomatoes than they want or can use.

TARIFF ON WOMENS TRUNKS

How Customs Officers Dive Into the Mysteries of the Feminine Toilet.

New York Times.

There is a bride among the passengers, a sweet thing, the soul of conscientiousness. When the question, "Anything dutiable?" is propounded by the matter-of-fact customs officer to her, she appeals to Harry, standing by her side, with a confident "You know." "But really I don't know, my dear. You can tell better what's in your trunks than I can," from Harry. "Oh, but how can I tell?" she continues in despair. "I don't know what is wanted. I have some presents for friends; some little things I bought for myself, but really I don't know." "Would $50 cover the cost?" This from the staff, "I think it would, but perhaps you had better say $60." "All right, you will swear to that?" "Yes, but please wait a minute; perhaps I ought to think again before I swear. Oh, Harry, dear, is there anything I have forgotten? It would be so dreadful if I should swear to a lie. Let me see; (after a minute's calculation), yes; I really think $60 will cover the utmost." When the bride has vanished, the staff takes occasion to remark that this is quite an exceptional case. "Usually," he continues, "I much prefer a man's declaration to a woman's. As a rule you can't depend much on women. They have no sense of responsibility, and with most of them the desire to smuggle something amounts to a mania."

To the inspector the face is an open book—the feminine smuggler is caught and she knows it. Her cheeks glow as if with fire, great drops of perspiration stand on her forehead, her eyes have the look of a frightened hare, and all the while that wide-awake inspector is getting deeper into the mysteries of a young woman's toilet. It is the customs for inspectors to pass rather lightly over some articles, to make as little ado over them as possible, because long experience has taught them that women have feelings about some things which even a custom-house officer is bound to respect. But this is no common case. Duty is duty, business is business. Nothing must be slighted. Each article is therefore, separately unfolded, carefully felt over, held at arm's length and reluctantly put aside.

Quite another is this: It is the bride's trunk that is now undergoing examination. Besides the inspector there is a deputy appraiser present, inasmuch as her declaration made it certain there would be something for him to do. A delicate perfume ascends as the lid of the trunk is lifted. And, as the examination proceeds, scarcely a single article is displaced. Whatever the mysteries of the toilet hidden in that capricious receptacle they remain so for the most part, for what inspector would not spare the blushes of a bride? A glance informs the appraiser what the value of any article is, and in a twinkling he has prepared a schedule, figured the cost at $45 (quite a shade below the sum to which the lady was willing to make declaration), the duty at $14 50, passed her over to the Collector's deputy, who accepts the money, gives a receipt therefor, and the business is finished. It may be remarked here that the Customs officers seldom evince any disposition to go behind the declaration. Thus the articles on which the bride paid duty were intended for friends according to her own declaration; had she said they were her own, for personal use, nearly all would have passed duty free. One article, for example, was a handsome fan, another a scarf pin, another a lace collar, &c. Some people will speak of her as a lady, others a fool.

An Unexpected Anti-Climax.

From the Detroit Free Press.

One day as I stood in the door of the postoffice in a small town in South Carolina, I saw a man enter a saloon opposite. In thirty seconds he reappeared having passed out of the back door and turned a lumber pile. He came straight across the street, a look of fun on his face, and as he took a chair on the steps he whispered:

"Now, stranger, you'll see some fun in about three minutes."

"How?"

"Waal, my old woman is around the corner in the truck cart. She'll miss me and head straight for that bar to collar my neck. I won't be there and she won't give up looking until she has a set-to with the chap who hands out the pizen. She kin lick him, and I'll bet on it, and you jist sot still and you'll hear splinters fly!"

In about two minutes we saw the old woman cross the square and enter the saloon, and then we hurried over to look through the window, the man saying as we crossed:

"Stranger, onless yer made of cast iron and double bolted, yer hadn't better go in till the row is over!"

But there was no row. The old woman walked up to the bar, laid down one of the old-fashioned ten-cent scrips and called for whisky straight. Then she put one foot on the rail before the bar, elevated the glass and down went the "pizen" without a gasp. Up went before ordering the drink. They may deceive their friends, but they can't deceive me. I can tell by the way a man drinks whether he likes liquor or not, and it's no use to come the sick dodge over me. Besides, it's not my business to tell who are my customers. Yes, all kinds of people patronize a bar. A man can drop into a hotel office without exciting suspicion, and if he passes through the office into the bar and takes a nip no one will be the wiser. I can tell you the names of men in all walks of life, even church members and statesmen, who have taken their bitters right off this bar as freely as the broken down toper would drink a glass of five cent. I recall one man prominent in church and charitable work who drops in here very frequently with the facetious little remark that he has 'been spitting pants buttons all morning,' and takes a cocktail with the utmost grace imaginable."

"What is the most popular drink you compound," was asked, as the lightning mixer poured out a lemonade, stuck two straws into it and shoved it across the bar to a customer.

"Cocktail," was the reply, as a silver half dollar dropped into the till and forty cents change was thrown upon the bar.

"Mixed drinks have their season however. In winter hot Scotches, hot bourbons and ryes, hot Irishes, 'blue blazes,' and hot lemonades are in demand. Tom and Jerry is also a winter drink, but is popular only during the coldest weather, and is fast giving way to other drinks. In summer the cocktail and all cold drinks are mostly called for. As I said before, though, the cocktail is popular all the year around. It is usually made of whisky, gin or brandy and sometimes champagne. A small quantity of either of these liquors placed in a glass, given a dish of absinthe or some other cordial, cooled with ice, and turned through a serve, is, when a piece of lemon peel has been added, a very palatable drink. Cocktails are drank mostly by habitual drinkers before breakfast. I know one man who often drinks as many as eight cocktails before breakfast. He says he has no appetite until he has drank three or four. Then by drinking a little warm milk he is enabled to partake of his breakfast and relish it. Next in popularity is the whisky sour, which is called for at all hours of the day. Then come the fizzes, made of gin, whisky, and brandy. They are divided into three classes: plain gin fiz, silver fiz, and golden-fiz. The fizzes are what are called sweet drinks. Next on the list are the plain lemonades, seltzer lemonade, and Appolinaris' lemonade, the last two of which are growing in popularity with drinkers. Another drink which would be popular were it not so expensive is brandy and soda. This is a gilt-edged, imported English beverage, and only the bon tons drink it. It is made by placing an ordinary drink of brandy in a champagne glass, adding enough imported seletour soda to fill the glass and it must be drank immediately else it loses its virtue. Next come the cobblers made of whisky, Rhine wine, and sherry, which are followed by the punches. The Santa Cruz rum milk punch is very popular. The proportions for mixing it are one-half a tablespoonful of sugar, half a pint of milk, a tablespoonful of Santa Cruz rum, a little cordial, and a jigger of brandy. It should then be shaken well, and served with nutmeg. Punches are also made in the same manner as milk punch, an egg being added.

"Then, come the cordials, absinthe, benedictine, anisette, moraschino, chartreuse, and Italian Vermouth. These cordials are all used as flavors. Vermouth is an excellent appetizer, and is made into cocktails. It is also used in making what is called the Manhattan cocktail, the liquor in which is gin. A delicious drink is made by mixing all these cordials. It is called pousse cafe. The cordials are poured into the glass one at a time, and a skillful mixture of drinks can prevent their commingling, so that by looking at the glass the drinker can distinguish each cordial by its color. The glass is filled to the brim with brandy which is ignited. After the brandy has become heated, the flame is extinguished, the edge of the glass cooled with ice and the mixture taken down at one swallow. This is an after-dinner drink, and it costs fifty cents. Next to the cordials may be classed the wines, which are divided into five kinds, claret, Sauterne, Burgundy, sherry and port. The clarets, Sauternes, and Burgundys are mostly after-dinner wines and are seldom drank across the bar. There are many drinkers who drink nothing but wine. They may drink just as much as the men who take nothing but whiskey, but it affects them differently. Their habits are different. The whiskey drinker always takes a cocktail before breakfast, while the wine drinker gets up an appetite for the morning meal on Appolinaris water or seltzer."

"Two glasses of Bass ale, if you have it on tap," exclaimed a customer, and the barkeeper turned aside to fill the order.

WITHIN AND WITHOUT.

The long, deserted street was strewn
With many a sodden autumn leaf,
And in the rain's dull monotone
The clouded heaven besought relief.
Thou, in thy cozy home's retreat,
Wert careless of the cold, dark day;
Friends smiled to hear thy fancies sweet,
And in thy gaiety were gay.

I passed without, and saw thy face;
I heard thy voice and drank thy smile,
And marked thee in thy careless grace,
Forgetful of the storm the while.
No whisper hadst thy heart of me,
Nor my near presence, as I passed;
Yet all day long, because of thee,
This truant heart beat warm and fast.

'Tis years since our farewell was said,
And in life's bleak November day
The withered hopes of youth are shed,
Like autumn leaves, about my way;
Yet oft beneath time's lowering skies,
O'erburdened with their weight of woe,
The old, sweet sunlight of thine eyes
Shines on me from the long ago.

MINNEAPOLIS. —K. H. B.

THE MACREADY RIOT.

St. Francis-in-the-slums struck one. The voice of That Dear Louise, which had been raised in altercation with the poet, a pitch above the shriek of the winter equinoctial outside, ceased suddenly as its fair owner caught her startled breath. The Traveling Man rubbed his premature baldness and yawned relievedly, while the Chorus Girl suspended for a moment her pious occupation of burning curacoa upon the table beneath the drooping but resonant nose of the Chaperon. The Poet groaned feebly and the Actor looked about the room. When Bond street was still a place of residence, and the Battery still the finest park in the world; when the McFlimseys lived in West Washington place; when Plancus was consul and Louise Napoleon president, the place had been in the height of the mode. It was one of those numerous little bars, or cabarets, that line the basements of Clinton place. The apartment wherein these belated revelers sat had been the breakfast room of Crassus Dives, shipowner, of South street. It had a queer old black marble mantel, and there were varnished paper gods and goddesses on the ceiling. I suppose young Dives draws rent from the house yet, and feeds his fashionable follies on such plebeian ones as these here chronicled; and that the chorus girl may help to support the prima donna of the variety theater as well off as on the boards. So all things work for good.

As the Actor finished his survey of the surroundings, his glance fell upon the Chorus Girl, who had gone to sleep with her head against the wainscot, while the light of the gas-jet above cast deep shadows around her eyes, and made more marked the ghost of the malicious grimace which lingered on her face.

That Dear Louise and the Traveling Man were oblivious to aught, save themselves. She was listening, with sleepy gravity, as he related some particularly bonus fortunes of his in Louisville.

"If you were sober enough to listen," said the Actor, "I would tell you a story about a woman who looked like the Chorus Girl, especially the hair—drab that shows golden in a cross-light."

"That's immoral," said the Poet, raising his head and blinking like an owl. "It's a premium on drunkenness. If I were sober enough to listen, you'd bore me to death. I could tell you a story, several stories about her, and very good stories from a bad point of view. But go on. I'll bet you two ponies—not money ponies—brandy ponies—funny little beasts, how they go trot, trot, trot, down your throat, like little cats, and pat, pat, pat, into your head, like little mice with bright eyes, and then you see things and write—beg your pardon, I'm talking shop. I'll bet you a room I you can't talk me to sleep by daylight. Break a glass—it's the only way to wake the waiter."

He relapsed, exhausted into an expectant heap.

The Actor laughed a little nervously, and went on:

"Well, it's not much of a story, and very likely I'll forget the point, but what there is you're welcome to, though I never told it before, and it's rather late now to begin."

"It was in '49—no I'm not mixed as to my dates [he said, with a smile, as the poet opened his mouth as if to correct him, and then shut it again without speaking.] I dare say you thought me hardly forty, but I'm fifty-two. I met her—the woman who looked like her—on New Year's day, '49. She lived in one of the middle houses of the Colonnade, in Lafayette place—you remember that row of low granite houses, with the Corinthian pillars upholding the porticoes?"

[Yes, the Poet knew. The Critic was there now, and the North American and the Churchman—Turkish baths across the street.]

They are divided from the sidewalk by ten or fifteen feet of grass, as if their builders tried to gain even more of seclusion than the quiet place could give.

There was a cousin of mine, a Dick Poyntz, her father's right-hand man, and, as he expected, soon to be made his partner. Mr Salisbury was a large Front street importer, and Dick's prospects were therefore very good.

He was a quiet chap that—never saying anything about himself and very little about any one else. We roomed in the same house here in Clinton place, about a block west of this. I had never seen Marjory Salisbury, but I knew that he was quite gone on her. He had her picture in his room, and I used to think that he said his prayers to it in the dark; and when I had a petit souper he never would give up his room to it, for fear the picture would see something, I suppose.

It interested me a good deal, too. I used to look at it—when he was out—and admire its beauty, and when, this New Year's day, he surprised me by proposing to call together, I readily assented. But when I met her in the drawing room of the house in Colonnade—I said she looked like this woman. The world is given to lying, and I am of the world. I have never seen such a face. Long, dark eyes, scarce opening under the heavy lids and thick, dark lashes; thick, curling lips of vivid scarlet, fair skin, and an exquisitely rounded chin and throat, like Canova's Psyche. That was all the Canova about her, though; the rest had the mark of Constant on it. As I looked into her eyes I saw in them a new, strange and wondrously—but it was only animal magnetism, I suppose, and I suppose I am tiring you with this rhapsody. But her hair was like this girl's here. Is it her's, or a wig; do you know?

We went together two or three times afterward. He seemed to have no fear of being cut out, and as I was hit a little harder in the same place every time I called, I began to cultivate a good hearty hate for him—a hate that would have suited Dr. Johnson. I believe I hate him yet, from force of habit, though he died of the '53 cholera, and I hated him all the more because he was so cursedly sure of his seat. However, my unhappy condition was much mended when, one evening in later January, I came home and found him packing his trunk. News had been received that day, he explained briefly, that made it necessary for him to sail for England on a Cunarder that left the next day, and I expected at once that a large failure in Liverpool, which had just been announced, had something to do with the sudden voyage. Well, he sailed to be gone six weeks at the least, probably longer, and I swore a solemn vow to stand in his shoes by the time he was back.

A man may lose lots of good looks in thirty years; so perhaps you'll believe that I was a handsome man then. I had money, too, in city real estate. I believe there are lawyers living on the last of it yet. So you see my ambition was not altogether vain.

There is no use telling you how the time passed, and Poyntz was still indefinitely detained abroad. Spring came at last, and the narrow strip of grass before the house in the Colonnade grew greener each day, and the young leaves threw heavier shadows before us on the path across Washington square as we walked back on moonlight nights from her aunt's in Christopher street—devilish convenient old lady, but used to wonder at the colossal assurance of Poyntz, who seemed to take his election so calmly for granted; for, as I never could tell whether she cared for him before, I never could be sure that she didn't care for him now. So, of course, I got crazier all the time.

At last, one night—I haven't forgotten the date; it was the 9th of May—Marjory was more gracious to me than ever before, and I fancied that I could see in her eyes—detect in her voice—some signs of love, which she could no longer conceal. When I took my leave I ventured to kiss her hand. By gad, it was a Spaniard who said a white hand can not offend, when the queen slapped his face, wasn't it? She didn't resent it, except by some formula; said I was a foolish boy, or something. After a sleepless night, I resolved that I would ask her that evening after the play—for we were going to the old Broadway theater to see Forrest in the Gladiator—to be my wife. Not only was it impossible for me to remain any longer in suspense, but there was danger of Poyntz returning at any time. All day I felt as if I was under the influence of a small dose of hasheesh; everything looked rose-colored and beautiful; for the more I thought of it the surer seemed my success that night. I passed the afternoon in walking, trying to calm my excitement. I must have been a holy show, with my bell-crowned beaver tipped back on my head; my neckerchief climbing over my collar; my face flushed and my eyes fixed in vacancy—seeing nothing but her face, thinking of nothing but what that night might give me.

I remember coming out of my trance at one time and finding myself standing before a placard posted on a dead wall, far down on one of the East side avenues, I think, staring fixedly at it, while several street Arabs were gathered about me, probably attracted by my appearance and manner. There was a flaming American flag printed at the top of the poster, and under it several words in large letters calling upon somebody to arise and resent the insult to the nation and to hurl back defiance.

With a vague wonder as to whom defiance was to be hurled at, I hurried through a side street to the Bowery, to take a car home. On my way I passed several of these placards, some headed with the American flag, and a few with the union jack. These latter, however, were generally defaced with mud, and torn so as to be quite unreadable. On one of them I could make out the last words: "Remember, Englishmen, and protect your countryman to-night!" Beside it was another with the exhortation: "Let all true Americans remember to-night at Astor place!"

I remembered it enough to get out when the car reached it, and walked on through to Clinton place, with a sidelong glance, of course, southward to the Colonnade. As I passed the Astor opera house I came upon a large crowd of men, the majority of them pretty hard-looking specimens, who, however, as a rule, were quiet and orderly. They were staring up at the long windows between the brick pillars.

I stopped and stared, too; but seeing nothing more remarkable than a good many policemen about the doors, pushed on through the crowd, breaking my shins incidentally over several piles of paving stones which had been torn up the day before for repairing Eighth street. At the corner of Broadway I asked a policeman what the matter was. He answered civilly that the Dead Rabbits and Bowery Boys, and several other apparently very patriotic organizations had boasted that they were going to stop Macready, the English actor, from appearing at the opera house that night as Macbeth.

"Do you think they will do it?" I asked, curiously.

"Do it, sir?" he echoed with a laugh; "not no more than they did the first night a week ago, when Macready played here. They don't mean nothing but to frighten him, 'cause they can't, you see. The buil theayter will be crammed with us," and his blue coat settled out across his chest as he ended, and I went on, respecting more than ever the prowess of the Metropolitan police.

The carriage came a little after 7 o'clock, and we started back through Astor place, by which route the coachman intended to reach Lafayette place and the Colonnade. We had hardly reached Broadway when the vehicle became entangled in a throng of carriages bearing their owners to the opera house, and farther down to the old Broadway theater, where Forrest was. We had a pleasant time in getting through. The big blackguards on the sidewalk slanged us like fun, while the little blackguards on the street skipped about under the horses and stuck pins in them, till, with their prancing and the swearing of the drivers, and the squeaking of the women inside the carriages, the place was a kind of Bedlam on wheels. After a while, though, they got the gas up in the theater, and the doors open, and in went the crowd—everybody who could buy or steal a ticket—swarming like bees. Mackerelville and Stuyvesant square fighting for places in a deuce of a mix and muss that I was glad to be out of, for the uproar inside grew infernal—cat-calls, shrill whistles and the cries of all the animals under the sun—while the dense crowd outside shouted and yelled in sympathy, though kept back from the doors by a strong body of policemen. We got through at last and around to the Salisburys, and from there, of course, it was but a short way, and that clear, to the old Broadway.

The theater was quite as large as the opera house, and was densely packed with an audience whose enthusiasm seemed at fever heat. It greeted Forrest's appearance with furious and prolonged applause, lasting for several minutes. Of course, the old 'uns took it all in as approbation for his course with Macready, and stood ducking and bobbing in all directions, till I thought he'd forgotten his lines for sheer delight. However, he got at it before long, and hang me if I know who made the most noise, he or the gallery. We had a stage box, and so got a good deal of the dust off the boards and lots of creak. Marjory seemed to like it, however. She leaned on the rail with her eyes fixed on the stage, and, of course, before long Forrest caught on and began playing at her—positively mugged her, by Jove—but she seemed to like it, as I said, and he must have.

She was indeed more beautiful that night than ever before. A vivid color flashed through her fair skin, her dark eyes shone with suppressed excitement, her scarlet lips were parted a little with quick-drawn breath. If you'd ever known the old man you would know that it was just this kind of thing that would make him throw himself; and he did, till, in spite of my sulks, I joined with the rest in the scene, when, as the myrmillo, he conquers the retiarius, and, with his foot on him, appeals to the boxes—I mean the empress—as to whether it shall be thumbs up or down—life or death.

The thunders of applause were dying away, when a sound came through the open windows above the gallery, which suddenly hushed every hand and tongue—the sound of heavy volleys of musketry coming from the north, and evidently distant but a little way. A moment's silence followed, and then a dull roar, as of a thousand voices, sounding like the distant thunder of the surf.

Marjory started backward, grasped my arm, growing very pale. Perhaps she had a premonition. But I am getting ahead too fast. Many of the audience rose in their seats with frightened exclamations, and hurried down the aisles to the doors, all apparently filled with a vague terror and desire to learn what was going on at the Astor Place Opera house, for every one knew of the threats which had been made to keep the Englishman off the stage, even if violence was required. Evidently some such foolhardy attempt had been made and resisted by the 200 policemen that guarded the building, until the crowd, at first inclined to take the matter as a joke, had become enraged and a conflict followed. But whence the musketry?

I excused myself, and hurried out with the rest. As the throng reached the lobby I heard an old gentleman beside me say to a companion in an excited tone:

"But I tell you, man, it was platoon firing, and that means terrible work."

At these words I was seized with something of the panic all around me. Had the riot grown to such formidable proportions that the military had been called out? Would the mob conquer?—and if so, where would it end? The best thing was to get Marjory home at once, for if we waited till the end of the play, Lafayette place might be impassable—nay, it might even now be difficult to regain the Colonnade. I pushed my way back to her and told her of my wish.

She acquiesced without a word; though, as I now remember it, her last glance at Forrest, who was still on the stage, must have given him another passion to add to the tatters of those which strewed the boards.

In a moment more we were on the outside, and after some delay, caused by the unusual confusion around the carriages, I found our own and directed the driver to reach the place by the way of Fourth street. Broadway was full of men, women and children, all gazing up toward Astor place. I stood on the box a moment and saw a line of flat caps and round shoulders stretched across the street a little way above the New York hotel—a cordon of police dividing the shootable from the unshootable, much to the disgust of both. The sound of firing still came at intervals, and the glare of each volley lighted up the fronts of the houses on the west side of Broadway, opposite the opera house. There was a constant rattle of pistol-shots and the ominous roar of the mob continued incessantly. As we drove through the watching crowd about us, with their faces showing pale and frightened in the lights from the stores on either side, even Marjory, who had recovered from her first momentary fear, now drew closer to me and turned her face toward me as she asked, in a low whisper, whether there was any danger. It was a strange time for wooing, with death and devastation a few blocks from us, as we drove swiftly through Fourth street. I drew her toward me and kissed her on the mouth, and murmured something about protecting her forever after from any harm. She lay in my arms and smiled up into my eyes as I kissed her again and again. And so we were betrothed.

The next moment the carriage drew up before the house in the Colonnade, but I did not know this until the driver sprang from his box and opened the door, seemingly very desirous of getting us out as quick as possible, and himself and horses out of danger. I sprang to the sidewalk and helped Marjory out. A gust of wind had filled the street with smoke and the odor of burning powder, through which shouts, groans and curses came from Astor place, hardly a third of a block above. Before us on the sidewalk, near the iron fence, lay a man, face downward, while two others bent over him as if to learn how badly he was wounded. Some others were tearing up the paving stones a little farther down, and with these ponderous missiles disappeared in the murky gloom ahead, through which shone the lights of the upper windows of the opera house. As we hurried across the sidewalk, past the prostrate figure, one of the two bending over it rose with an oath.

"It's no use, Jim; he's squeaked for good this time. I'm going to cut for the Bowery. They'll be down here in a minute." And he darted past us down toward Fourth street.

The other also rose, looked after the disappearing figure, and then, drawing a heavy revolver, muttered:

"I'll have another shot at them if I get a dose myself," and skulked past us toward the opera house.

Against the gate leaned a young man, bareheaded and coatless, his ragged trowsers stuck into his tattered boots. The blood was trickling from his side; his face was covered with grimy. He was staring steadily toward the hideous conflict beyond. He had just finished loading a long, old-fashioned musket, and raised it to his shoulder. As we reached him, he fired straight up the street, indifferent, apparently, as to whether he hit soldier or rioter, and commenced loading again with automatic slowness and deliberation. He was mad, I suppose, with excitement.

I pushed him aside, threw open the gate and drew Marjory up the short walk toward the steps, but had hardly gone five feet when a figure sprang down from between the pillars and confronted us.

It was my cousin Poyntz. Marjory uttered a faint cry and started back, clinging to my arm.

He stepped forward, his heavy brows meeting in an ominous frown as he grasped her wrist.

"Are you mad, to bring her home at such a time?" he cried, furiously, as he drew her toward the steps. "Why did you take her out to-night? Marjory, go into the house."

"My dear cousin," I answered, as I put my arm around her waist and drew her away from him, "you are assuming a tone which I should do right to resent. Pray, who gave you the authority to govern Miss Salisbury's movements in this away?" He stood looking at us for a minute, his hands clenched by his side.

"Marjory, do you let him touch you in that way?" he asked, in a low voice.

She trembled violently, and stretched out both hands before her piteously.

"Dear Dick, don't make a scene. I didn't know you were coming home to-night; besides, I was mistaken. I have found out since you were gone that I—I didn't love you—and"

"Do you mean?" he asked slowly, "that when you learned from your father a week ago that he was ruined, and I also, of course, you decided to cast me aside and take him, whom you know to be rich?"

She cowered before him with frightened eyes, but did not answer.

"Come, Poyntz, no more of this!" I exclaimed angrily. "Stand aside and let us go into the house. She is my promised wife, if that will satisfy you," and I tried to pass him, but he pushed me back violently, and turned to her:

"Is that true?" he asked.

The wounded man at the gate raised his musket and fired up the street.

A deafening volley seemed to answer it, but it was poured down Astor place instead of Lafayette.

"Is it true?" he asked again, in a lower and more distinct voice.

"My God!" I cried, "are we to stand here all night, and be riddled like targets, for you to rehearse your infernal catechisms and put on your tragedy airs. Get out of the way."

Marjory stared at him a moment; then, by a sudden effort, recovered herself.

"It is true, Mr. Poyntz! Will you let us pass?" and her eyes met his defiantly as her hand rested lightly on my arm. He bowed and stepped from the stone walk upon the grass.

At that moment a shrill voice from the street cried, "They are wheeling this way! They are going to fire!"

A wild skurry of feet in the street behind, a howl of brutal terror from the beaten mob.

I turned and looked up toward the opera house. A gust of wind had blown away the smoke.

I saw a dark gray line stretched across the end of the street, and a row of gleaming gun-barrels leveled down the street at the retreating rioters.

Majory and Poyntz also turned and saw the silent line beyond, and the panic-stricken fugitives on the walk and in the street.

As we stood motionless staring at the musket barrels, as if fascinated by their dusky shine below the range of lights in the theater behind them, the sharp monosyllable of command cut sharply through the tumult.

She stood next to me—almost by my side. She threw herself upon his breast, shielding him with her body.

A bright flash lighted up the pillars behind us from plinth to the acanthus leaves of the capitals.

A roar, a patter of lead on the granite pillars behind us, and Marjory Salisbury sank down upon the grass at his feet. Half dazed, I sprang toward him, but he motioned me back, a ghastly smile on his face.

"She is mine now. Did I not tell you she loved me?" And, kneeling down, he raised her head upon his knee, and kissed her.

* * * * *

The Actor raised his head and looked about him fearfully, wondering if his strange companions had heard his history. The gas, cut off at the meter, was dying in the jet, and beneath it the little company looked like some party of revelers death-stricken in their seats at the end of their revel. Sleep had claimed them for his own, save only the Poet, who stared across the tables at the door behind the Actor's head and preserved an attitude of strained attention, as one who listens for a sound he dreads to hear.

At length he rose. "Ugh!" he said, "I can see it—blood and powder! You will have to stay with me to-night."

The Chorus Girl stirred in her sleep, and a hard cough shook her slim figure till the bangles at her wrist jingled. The sound diverted the Poet's attention. "Poor little girl," he said, and stooped and kissed her quite reverently on the forehead.

"But what a Cavalry Cemetery hack," said the Actor. "Come on; button your coat."

"Are you going to leave these people here? He'll be robbed," pointing to the Traveling Man.

"He has a mission," said the Actor, seriously; "it is to be robbed. Let us not interfere with the decree. Come on."

And together they passed into the waning night, made ghastly with the dying lament of the wind and the sibilant whisper of the electric light above the cafe door.

Was She Napoleon's Daughter?

Vienna Neue Freie Presse: A few days ago the German newspaper of Cologne spread the report that a daughter of Napoleon I. had died there in most wretched circumstances. The only fact actually known is that some days ago in Lindenthal, close by Cologne, an aged unmarried woman died and was buried at the expense of the parish. This woman, Falkenburg by name, during her life betrayed an almost childish veneration for the great Corsican, and her poor room was adorned with numerous pictures of the Bonaparte family. When disease seized her and she saw her death at hand, she bade the woman who waited upon her unlock a desk and take out a bundle of letters and burn them before her eyes. At last, in the delirium of death, she is said to have declared herself to be a daughter of Napoleon. This is at present all that can be positively said of the mystery which surrounded this person, although the Muelneimer Volkszeitung claims to know from trustworthy sources that Miss Falkenberg was the very child that came into the world at the archbishop's palace in Cologne in the year 1811 as the daughter of a noble maiden, who had sustained intimate relations to Napoleon—the child, who at her baptism received the name of Countess von Falkenberg, and for whom Frederick William III. was sponsor. That child was brought up at Napoleon's expense at Montjoie, and then sent to an Italian convent, from which, having arrived at young womanhood, she was released between the years 1830 and 1840. The property inherited by the young countess at this time was soon dissipated, partly by luxury and partly by benevolence; and so it came about that she returned in poverty to Cologne at the beginning of the year 1850, in order, with the aid of prominent citizens, to petition Napoleon III. for a further support. When every effort in that direction had failed, she was compelled to earn her living with her own hands, and under the name of Falkenberg she led the wretched life of a solitary seamstress until last week death released her from it.

THE MORTGAGE ON THE FARM.

We worked through spring and winter, through summer and through fall;
But the mortgage worked the hardest and the steadiest of us all;
It worked on nights and Sundays; it worked each holiday;
It settled down among us and never went away.
Whatever we kept from it seemed a'most as bad as theft;
It watched us every minute, and it ruled us right and left.
The rust and blight were with us sometimes, and sometimes not;
The dark-browed, scowling mortgage was forever on the spot.
The weevil and the cut-worm, they went as well as came;
The mortgage staid on forever, eating hearty all the same.
It nailed up every window, stood guard at every door,
And happiness and sunshine made their home with us no more,
Till with failing crops and sickness we got stalled upon the grade,
And there came a dark day on us when the interest wasn't paid;
And there came a sharp foreclosure, and I kind o' lost my hold,
And grew weary and discouraged, and the farm was cheaply sold.
The children left and scattered when they hardly yet was grown;
My wife she pined and perished, an' I found myself alone.
What she died of was "a mystery," and the doctors never knew;
But I know she died of mortgage—just as well as I wanted to.
If to trace a hidden sorrow were within the doctor's art,
They'd ha' found a mortgage lying on that woman's broken heart.
Worm or beetle, drouth or tempest, on a farmer's land may fall,
But for first-class ruination trust a mortgage 'gainst them all.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

How to Clean Wall Paper.

To clean wall paper take off the dust with a soft cloth. With a little flour and water make a lump of very stiff dough, and rub the wall gently downward, taking the length of the arm each stroke, and in this way go round the room. As the dough becomes dirty cut the soiled parts off. In the second round commence the stroke a little above where the last one ended, and be very careful not to cross the paper or to go up again. Ordinary papers cleaned in this way will look fresh and bright and almost as good as new. Some papers, however, and these most expensive ones, will not clean nicely; and in order to ascertain whether a paper can be cleaned nicely it is best to try it in some obscure corner where it will not be noticed if the result is unsatisfactory. If there be any broken places in the wall, fill them up with a mixture of equal parts of plaster of paris and silver-sand, made into a paste with a little water; then cover the place with a little piece of paper like the rest, if it can be had.

The Latest Craze.

The latest craze among the ladies is a "hair album"—gentlemen's hair. Young men are besought for a lock of hair, and the request is such a flattering one that they are only too happy to comply when the right damsels apply. The contribution is tied with a blue ribbon, and goes into the "hair album," along with the hair of a crowd of other fellows. Over it will be written the name, age, color of eyes, date of receiving the memento, and general remarks as to the personal appearance, etc., which may or may not be complimentary, as the album is never to be seen by any other than feminine eyes. The young ladies are as proud of their trophies as an Indian warrior is of the scalps he takes.

Household Hints.

A very handsome lambrequin for a bracket is made in five points. The points should be about five inches wide at the top, and from seven to nine in length. A pretty arrangement in color is to have the center point of dark maroon or crimson plush; then have the points at each side of drab or French-gray satin, and the outer ones of very dark green plush. Line the points with dark maroon Canton flannel; the double-faced is best, as it will give body to the plush and satin. Where the points join work fancy stitches in various colored silks, and on each satin point paint a spray of flowers. A lovely design is of laurel blossoms and buds, for one, and on the other a moss rosebud and leaves, or a spray of lobelia with its delicate blue flowers. The points are finished with silk balls or tassels; the top may be simply turned under and be tacked to the shelf, or have an embroidered band to cover the edge. These points are pretty as a finish for one end of a table scarf. The other end may have a plain band of plush or satin.

Read this and find a new and approved way of making cocoanut pudding. It is a suitable conclusion to a most elaborate dinner: Beat two eggs very light, stir them in with a coffee-cup full of fresh milk, add one-quarter of a pound of grated cocoanut, three tablespoonfuls each of grated bread and powdered sugar, two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, one cup of raisins and the grated peel of one lemon. Beat all until well mixed. Butter the bottom and sides of a cold pudding dish and pour the mixture in; bake slowly for an hour, scatter powdered sugar over it and serve with or without fruit; oranges cut up are very nice with it. The pudding dish should be cold when buttered, so that more butter will adhere to it, and then the pudding will turn out smoothly.

A simple but very handsome scarf for a small table is made by taking three strips of broad ribbon, have the center strip of a contrasting color; for instance, if the two outer pieces are of the ombre or shaded ribbons so much in use a year or two ago, let the center be of cardinal; turn the ends back to make them pointed, and put a tassel on each point; baste the ribbon to a lining of silesia, old silk, or even of canton flannel, and where the edges join work fancy stitches. A great variety of scarfs could be made in this form, and be ornamented by putting sprays of flowers in embroidery or painting on each point, or a vine or scroll could be worked with good effect on the center stripe.

A spice cake which costs but little, and which if eaten while fresh is excellent, is made after this rule: Rub half a cup of butter and one cup of sugar together until they are light as cream. Beat the white and yolk of one egg separately; add this, and also half a cup of sweet milk, one teaspoonful each of nutmeg, cinnamon, and cloves; mix one teaspoonful of baking powder with one cup and a half of flour. Bake in a loaf, and frost, using the white of one egg, and frost the top only. After spreading the frosting over it, set it in the oven and brown it slightly. If you chose you can vary this receipt by adding half a cup of raisins or currants.

Happy is the woman who can have for use in cooking genuine, freshly-made buttermilk. The following recipe for crullers is a proof of this: Half a pint of buttermilk, a small teacupful of butter, two cups of sugar, and three eggs. Beat the eggs, and then add the milk and sugar. Half a teaspoonful of soda, dissolved in a little hot water, should then be added. Grate half a nutmeg and stir in with a teaspoonful of salt, and half a teaspoonful of ground cinnamon of good strength. Work in flour enough to make a firm, smooth dough. Roll this and cut out cakes in fancy shapes, or twist like ordinary fried cakes. Fry in hot lard.

For a delicate and very nice dessert make a pudding thus: Dissolve half an ounce of gelatine in half a pint of cold milk; let it come to a boil gradually. When hot, but not boiling, add the yolk of three well-beaten eggs; stir constantly. Sweeten to your taste; or, if you wish a definite direction, put in a quarter of a pound of sugar. This is the right amount for most people. When this is cold, stir in it a pint of whipped cream. Flavor with lemon or vanilla; and, the last thing, stir in the whites of the three eggs; have them beaten quite stiff. Serve this cool, with cake or with fruit.

Here is a suggestion of value for a small family, say of two persons: Bake a cake in a long tin, cut it into two parts, and put in any filling you choose. You will have two nice layers, and the cake will probably all be eaten before it is too dry to be enjoyed. A good recipe for this cake is: The whites of two eggs, one cup of white sugar, half a cup of milk or water, one cup and a half of flour, half a teaspoonful of baking powder. If made with care, the butter and sugar beaten to a cream, and as much pains taken as if it were an expensive cake, this will be delicious.

Here is a good way to cook canned lobster: Spread the meat on a platter and pick out the coral; rub the coral smooth and mix with it the grated yolks of three hard-boiled eggs; mince the lobster meat fine; make a batter of milk and flour and one or two eggs; beat all the lumps out of the flour, and add the lobster and coral to this. You need flour enough to make a batter stiff enough to hold the meat in shape, so that you can form it in round cakes and fry. Use either salad oil or clarified butter; the butter is less expensive, and answers just as well.

Sponge-drops are nice to mix with other cake in the basket. Beat four eggs to a stiff froth, then stir in one heaping cup of sugar and one cup and a third of flour. One teaspoonful of baking powder should be thoroughly mixed with the flour. Flavor with lemon and drop from a dessertspoon on buttered paper spread on tin plates. The oven should be hot, and the cakes will bake in a few minutes. They require watching, as they are very likely to brown too much.

A handsome lambrequin for a corner bracket of ebony is made of dark blue satin, with a band of plush or velvet across the bottom. The satin should be fringed out to form the finish; on the satin paint or embroider some stalks of golden rod, with a butterfly fluttering over them. Another pretty way to fix a bracket is to have simply a band of fringed-out crimson satin tacked to it, with a delicate vine painted in oil or water colors on it.

Lemon jelly, to spread between layers of cake or on the top of sago or custard pudding, is made by grating the rind of two lemons and squeezing out the juice; add a heaping cup of sugar, a tablespoonful of butter. Stir these together and then add three eggs beaten very light; set the basin or little pail in which you have this in another of boiling water; stir it constantly until it thickens. When it is cold it is ready for use.

Do not attempt to remove the unsightly crust that is very likely to form on the top of a nursing baby's head. The head should be washed gently every morning with lukewarm water and white castile soap; then you can rub a little glycerine on the crust or scale, which will soften it and heal it; but to attempt to remove it with a comb or by hard rubbing will be a painful and useless operation.

A bit of economy is to save the peel of oranges, dry it, and grate it for flavoring mince pies and orange cakes, and custard also. If it is dried perfectly and is kept in a dry closet, there is no danger of its becoming musty.

Arrow root is recommended as the thickening for custards and sauces of all kinds, both for puddings and meats. It is preferred to corn starch by many on account of the flavor.

The flavor of bean soup is improved if a few slices of ham are boiled with the beans in beef stock. They may be removed before serving the soup.

Fried oysters make a delicious garnish for baked fish; they should be fried perfectly brown on both sides, and be arranged around the fish on the platter.

A GERMAN TRUST SONG.

Just as God leads me, I would go;
I would not ask to choose my way;
Content with what He will bestow,
Assured He will not let me stray.
So as He leads, my path I make,
And step by step I gladly take,
A child in Him confiding.

Just as God leads I am content;
I rest me calmly in His hands;
That which He has decreed and sent—
That which His will for me commands.
I would that He should all fulfill,
That I should do His gracious will,
In living or in dying.

Just as God leads, I all resign;
I trust me to my Father's will;
When reason's rays deceptive shine,
His counsel would I yet fulfill;
That which His love ordained as right,
Before He brought me to the light,
My all to Him resigning.

Just as God leads me, I abide,
In faith, in hope, in suffering true
His strength is ever by my side—
Can aught my hold on him undo?
I hold me firm in patience knowing
That God my life is still bestowing—
The best in kindness sending.

Just as God leads me, I onward go;
Oft amid thorns and briars seen;
God does not yet His guidance show—
But in the end it shall be seen
How, by a loving Father's will,
Faithful and true, He leads me still.

FOR RELIGIOUS REFLECTION.

How to Preach.

Congregationalist: There is now in progress at Cambridge, before the Divinity school, a series of very valuable lectures given by professors of the university who are not connected with the Divinity school. President Eliot gave the first lecture of the course. Dr. A. P. Peabody, Mr. Winsor, the librarian, Prof. Trowbridge and Prof. Hill (Boylston professor of rhetoric) have occupied the other evenings of the course. Prof. Hill's subject on the evening of the 14th was English in the Pulpit. His lecture was as good as a tonic. If any minister is afflicted with a "holy tone," or speaks the old-fashioned dialect of the pulpit, or cultivates a weakly and sentimental piety, or practices asceticism, he ought to get hold of the ideas presented by Prof. Hill and embody them forthwith in his mental and moral constitution. The lecture was a plea for naturalness, directness, vigor, manliness, and common sense in preaching, as opposed to the ecclesiasticism, the pulpit conventionalities, the "goody-goody" phrases, the cant, the sentimentality, which some preachers exhibit on the one hand, and the sensationalisms and slang which are heard from the pulpits of a few on the other hand. Good English in the pulpit must conform to the same standards as good English out of the pulpit. The usage and authority of the best writers and speakers must be followed everywhere. The minister must interest while he speaks, and must impress after he has ceased to speak. His language must be that which men are familiar in other walks of life; in the best books they read and the best speakers they hear. A minister who violates the rules of syntax requires the same treatment as any other man sinning in the same way. There are certain temptations in the ministerial office to the development of unmanly traits. The notion that a clergyman is a willing recipient of favors of all sorts, the fact that it is nobody's interest to criticise a preacher—except his wife's—help on this tendency, against which one must guard. Vigor in the pulpit will be respected by vigor outside of it; so, also, clearness, conciseness, sincerity. A preacher must keep the springs of his own life full, in order to refresh others. He must read not merely the literature of his profession. He must be more than a bookworm. He must mingle among men, he must know things, he must be familiar with nature. There are sermons that have no connection with the preacher; they are manufactured with the assistance of commentaries and other men's thoughts. But real sermons are a growth; they are the fruit of character and culture. They are the result of a mind working with all its energies toward a definite purpose.

Dr. Dix's Charges Again.

Christian Union: To charge licentiousness on Protestantism, as Dr. Dix does, is to ignore the well-known statistics of morals. Unchastity is the common sin of Roman Catholic France and Italy, while chastity is the national virtue of Protestant Germany and England. On the other hand, Puritan New England appears to be rapidly degenerating in morals, while the Roman Catholic population of America appear to be chaste and to preserve inviolate the family relation. Neither church can cast a first stone at the other in this matter. The doctrine that marriage is a civil contract is a natural but gross reaction from the sacramentarian theory of the middle ages. It is indeed a divine ordinance, and equally divine whether the marriage ceremony be performed by a bishop, by a justice of the peace, or by the parties themselves. If, instead of attempting to get us all into the Holy Catholic church, Dr. Dix would inaugurate a movement—moral, religious, but non-ecclesiastical, founded on the Bible but not on church decrees—to repeal the laws for the promotion of licentiousness, euphemistically called "Divorce laws," he would find ready to follow him enough men of all faiths, and forms, and creeds, to have some eventual hope of success.

A New Church for Dresden.

An appeal has been circulated for funds to build an edifice for St. John's American Episcopal church in Dresden, Germany. The sum of $5,000 is now in hand, and an additional sum of $10,000 is required to erect such a building as is needed. Bishop Littlejohn, in his indorsement of the appeal, says:

> No one acquainted with the facts will question our urgent need of a church edifice in Dresden. It is now more than twelve years since St. John's parish was organized, and during all that time its usefulness and influence have been sorely hindered, and more than once, its very existence imperiled by its lack of a duly appointed and permanent house of worship. We have no other parish in Germany, and this is the only church in all this great empire that, for years to come, will appeal to American churchmen for help to build an appropriate edifice. Having personal knowledge of the circumstances and also of the urgency which they have created, I wish it to be known to all who are likely to be influenced in their opinions or their contributions by my official sanction, that I hereby formally and earnestly indorse the efforts now being made to secure for St. John's parish a suitable habitation of its own; and heartily approve of all proper and lawful means that may be devised to accomplish this end.

Droppings from the Sanctuary.

The altar is snowy with blossoms,
The font is a vase of perfume,
On pillar and chancel are twining,
Fresh garlands of eloquent bloom.
"Christ is risen!" with glad lips we utter,
And far up the infinite height
Archangels the pæan re-echo,
And crown him with Lilies of Light!

It is said that missionary work among the Copts in Egypt is more hopeful than ever before since the overthrow of Arabi Pasha. One of the first persons to greet the United Presbyterian missionaries, on their resumption of work at Assyoot after the war, was the Coptic bishop. In another town, failing to secure one of their own people to expound the scriptures, the Copts engaged the services of a young man recently licensed by the Mission Presbytery. So great was the interest in his first sermon that he was compelled to give it three times. Women disguised themselves in male attire in order to get into the street and hear the preaching.

The American Missionary for March has an interesting account of a week's work by seven missionary women, employed in various fields from Washington to Alabama. By thus grouping the different forms of labor—teaching the little children, visiting the sick and aged, training to habits of cleanliness and industry, as well as doing distinctively religious work—one gets a new impression of the self-denying service of these women, who receive only $450 a year for salary, and traveling expenses.

The Episcopalians propose to establish a divinity school in Colorado. It is said to be almost impossible to get pastors from the East, as the field is a hard-working and underpaid one. They have a frame building to begin with, but want at least $20,000 endowment, the immediate funds to be devoted to furniture and other items. The Rev. W. C. Bishop, a fellow of Emmanuel college, Cambridge, has been engaged as dean or president.

The Calvary monumental Episcopal church of Philadelphia has been moved to a more eligible location four miles from its old site. Each stone was marked and the building as it stands is an exact fac-simile, in appearance of the old church, and is built of the same materials throughout.

Plans for the new college for the colored people to be erected at Little Rock, Ark.—the Philander Smith college—have been accepted, and work upon the buildings will very soon be commenced, under the supervision of the Freedmen's Aid society.

The census of missions to be taken next year will, it is estimated, show an increase of 200,000 native Christians in India, Ceylon, and Burmah, for the last ten years—500,000 in all. What does the doubter of Christian missions say to that?

The sums contributed by the various Protestant churches have increased in eighty years from $240,000 to $6,250,000. How far does that go to confirm the assertion that the missionary spirit is dying out?

The revision committee in London have just completed the second revision of the Old Testament. No date has yet been set for publication, as much remains to be done.

A female seminary after the plan of Vassar college, is to be erected at a cost of $200,000, by the Presbytery of Los Angeles, Cal.

Over $63,000 has been secured toward establishing a denominational house by the Unitarians of Massachusetts.

A wide-spread religious movement is in progress among the people of Finland.

The entire cost of the Sandwich Islands missions was $1,220,000.

GOING TO SCHOOL.

There's an army that musters its legions,
And marches to roll call each day;
And happy and blest are the regions
Which lie in that army's bright way.
They troop over hillock and hollow,
They spring across brooklet and pool,
And gayly and cheerfully follow
The summons which bids them to school.

By thousands the army is numbered,
Its soldiers are fresh as the morn;
Not one is by sorrow encumbered,
Not one is by care overborne.
At decimals sometimes they stumble,
And sometimes by verbs are perplexed,
And the proudest grows saddened and humbled
When a question is passed to the next.

But forgot at the briefest vacation
Are problems and puzzles and prose,
The grief of the stern conjugation,
That late was a fountain of woes;
And the army goes back to its duty
The hour that playtime is done,
Resplendent in love and in beauty,
Unmatched 'neath the light of the sun.

They gather, this wonderful army,
In field, and in grove, and in street;
Their voices are music to charm me,
So ringing and eager and sweet.
Their cheeks are as red as a cherry,
Their eyes are as pure as the day,
And the sound of their marching is merry,
Wherever they pass on their way.

There are people forever a sighing
And saying the world is all wrong;
But somehow their doubts take to flying
At sight of this wonderful throng.
The world may be clouded and weary,
Of trouble and toil may be full,
But at least there is hope where the cheery,
Dear children are going to school.

LORE FOR LITTLE ONES.

Buttons.

"Button, button, who has the button?" asked a glove that had been dropped on the toilet table.

"I've got it," answered Jimmy's jacket. "I've several buttons, in fact."

"No," put in the closet door, "I have it myself; the carpenter gave it to me."

"I had a dozen or so," said a boot, looking rather down at the heel.

"And I have a hundred or more," yawned the easy chair, "but they don't button anything; they don't belong to the working class."

"Here's a bachelor's button," remarked a vase of flowers on the bureau.

"There's a button-wood tree in the garden," said the button-hooker. "I suppose you all grew there."

"I know better than that," pouted the closet-door. "Mine grew in the veins of the earth, where all the precious metals are found. It's a poor relation of theirs."

"And we," added a pair of ivory sleeve-buttons, "we grew in the land of the white elephant. We were carved from the tusks of the leader, who threaded the jungles and swam the rivers at the head of his troops."

"My buttons," said the glove, "were nearly related to the gem which Cleopatra dissolved for Antony. They were mother-of-pearl, grown in the shell of the pearl oyster, for which divers risk their lives."

"That's something of a fish story," thought Jimmy's jacket. "My buttons are only glass; but glass is sometimes made of sand, and who knows but their atoms may have been swept down to the sea shore from 'farthest India?'"

"And I," whispered the bachelor's button, "I sprang from a tiny seed, with all my splendor of blue and purple wings, like the Afrite from the jar which the fisherman found on the beach. It is a miracle how I was packed away there!"

He was a fine wooden soldier. He had on a painted red coat and blue trousers. His hat was painted, too. It was black, with a white plume. He stood on a little wooden block, and held his gun up very straight indeed. He was a sentinel on duty, and he never took his eye off from Eddy's flannel kitten.

The kitten sat upon a small box with leather sides. When any one pinched the box, something squeaked. You might think it was the flannel kitten if you liked. Perhaps the little soldier knew, but he never told.

Eddy had put the soldier and the kitten on the table. The soldier was to watch the kitten. So long as he held his gun up, and kept his eye on her she did not try to run away. But suppose he were to lay his gun down? Who knows? The little soldier never thought of such a thing. He kept watch every minute.

"What a brave little soldier!" said Eddy. "I can run out and play now, for he will not leave my kitty."

"No," replied Eddy's mamma, "he will be very faithful. He will watch better than a certain little boy watched the baby. This boy forgot what he was told. He let the baby burn his finger, by his neglect of duty. His name was not Capt. Tot. His name was Eddy."

Now the little wooden soldier was called Capt. Tot. Perhaps he had been through the wars. If he had, he never ran away from the foe. He never slept on guard.

When he was praised in this way he said not a word. He kept on looking at the flannel kitten. His painted coat looked as red as ever. But Eddy's cheeks were redder. They were not painted, either. Eddy was thinking of the baby's finger.

Two Little Feet.

When Herbert Young was a very small boy his papa bought him a pair of button boots. They had cloth tops and kid toes and heels. Herbert danced for joy when he saw them.

"You shall wear them to-morrow," said his papa.

Herbert went to bed early that night; he wanted to-morrow to come quickly.

The next morning his sister put on the boots for him before she went to school. Herbert went about saying, "Two little feet, two little feet," all the morning.

"They must be good little feet, and not get into mischief," said papa.

Herbert's mother was expecting some friends to tea.

"I must make some cake," she said, "and Herbert can come into the kitchen if he will be good."

Herbert promised to be very good. It was great fun to see his mamma beat the eggs. He had a little taste of the sugar and butter when it was all beaten up white.

Then he saw the flour put in slowly.

At last it was ready for the oven when it was done his mamma covered the top with nice frosting. Herbert called it making snow on it.

His mamma wanted the frosting to grow hard. She put the cake on the piazza where it was cool.

"Do not touch it with your fingers," she said to her little boy, "mamma wants it to look very nice."

Herbert's mamma went back to the kitchen. She wished to make some nice salad.

Herbert was playing on the piazza.

He came in once or twice and said, "Two little feet, mamma, two little feet."

"Yes, my dear, I know the boots are very pretty."

By and by the lady went out on the piazza. What do you think she saw? Her little boy had been standing on the loaf of cake. She could see the shape of both little boots.

Herbert looked at his mamma, and said, "Pretty boots; two little feet; make mamma's cake all pretty."

Mamma did not think so. She made some more cake, and when her guests came she told the story.

One of them was a very famous man. He said, "I must have a piece of Herbert's cake. I want the stamp of the two little feet. He thought he was helping mamma."

Then all the visitors ate a piece of the cake, and one said: "May the little feet always walk in the right way."

And another said: "May they climb over all troubles as easily as they reached the top of mamma's cake."

Herbert is a man now, and very kind to his mother.

DISAPPOINTED DEADWOOD.

The Failure of the Sioux Treaty Received with Disgust in the Black Hills—Ordway's Course Criticised—Crow Dog's Lease of Life—New Land Offices.

DEADWOOD, Dak., Special Correspondence, March 11.—More disheartening news could not have been imparted to this community than that received yesterday by wire from Secretary Teller, to the effect that congress had failed to ratify the Sioux treaty. As intimated in a recent letter to the PIONEER PRESS, it was generally believed that favorable action had been taken by congress on this important matter, and that it only remained for the department to perform a little preliminary work when the greater portion of the reserve would be thrown open to settlement, and this valuable corner of Dakota placed next door neighbor to civilized States of the Union. The situation and prospects were, therefore, naturally bright and inspiriting, and, as Barney Caulfield expressed it, "Everybody was getting boozy over the good news," when along came the exceedingly wet blanket referred to. As yet the public does not understand how nor why the exceedingly righteous measure was defeated—such is the paucity of news in local papers.

THE CONSEQUENCES.

The amount of evil accomplished by the negative action of congress cannot now be fully stated because it does not all appear, but there is much to be cited beyond the retarded growth of the Territory, the delay in the development of resources and the establishment of thrifty, populous communities throughout the at present unoccupied and unproductive domain, and not the least important is the violation of faith with the Sioux. A better, more intelligent, painstaking and zealous commission could not have been appointed, as attested by its remarkable success with every tribe, whose greatest argument against a new treaty was that, as the government had repeatedly broken faith with them, it doubtless would continue to do so whenever caprice suggested. This was met by assurances of the most solemn character that the new treaty was for all time, and would be observed in letter and spirit. So strenuously was this promise urged that it was finally accepted; and a great difficulty overcome. That promise must now be broken at the very outset, the government and its commissioners estimated as triflers and liars, and the confidence so happily restored, again dispelled, as will appear, when, in the future, it becomes absolutely necessary to open up the great reservation. Another important consideration lies in the fact that for months past the question of opening the reserve has been before the people of the entire country attracting no little attention particularly from the restless thousands casting about in search of permanent homes.

DISAPPOINTMENT TO EMIGRANTS.

Many of these have fixed their eyes upon the fertile valleys lying between the Missouri and the Hills, and, latterly, believing that there was no good reason for delay in opening the tract for settlement, there would be none; they have prepared to emigrate. In fact, hundreds are now on their way. What is to become of them? Many will seek locations elsewhere; but many will, unless I am a poor judge of human nature, disregarding the action of congress move upon the reservation, to locations which they will hold by right of "Squatter Sovereignty." Already has this occurred, and should the tide of immigration to Dakota be as great as it promises, soon to be thousands of claims will be staked upon the forbidden ground and occupied before the close of the year. Of course, this will breed trouble with the Indians, and may possibly result in a serious outbreak if not another war, with all its horrors. "But the government will prevent immigration," say some. How? In 1875-6 a handful of daring miners penetrated the Black Hills, then the rightful territory of the Sioux exclusively, and occupied and surrounded by as hostile and barbarous a tribe as ever roamed the plains. The government forbade immigration, but only provoked a derisive smile in return. All available troops were despatched to arrest and take out the intruders, but, although few in numbers and menaced by danger from Indians as well as from the soldiery, the intrepid whites, with one exception, eluded capture, remained in the hills, and absolutely compelled congress to effect a treaty, whereby the hills were opened to settlement. If occupation could not be prevented then, it cannot be prevented now, and should an effort be made it will be found that the entire American army would be lost in the wilderness, endeavoring to hunt up a squatter and his camp. Congress made a great mistake, and will realize it at no distant day.

ANNEXATION AGAIN.

The PIONEER PRESS of the 3d, containing my letter in which reference is made to the proposition to annex the Hills to Wyoming, arrived yesterday, and created no little comment, highly favorable, by the way, as, for some reason best known to the editors, the press of the Hills has maintained profound silence upon the subject, although annexation is the wish of the people universally, and a wish of greater fervency since recent proceedings of the legislature. It is now understood, as never before, that this locality need expect no favors nor justice at the hands of a Dakota law-making body, made up as it invariably is of ignorance, avarice and malice. Not only are acts passed inimical to the best interests of the district, but every righteous measure presented by this people is either defeated in open session, or discountenanced by the all-wise Nehemiah who for some inscrutable reason was imported as the presiding genius over this great Territory. It is an open question whether the legislature or the governor is the most hurtful—the most bitterly opposed to the Black Hills section. One endeavors to impose a crippling bullion-tax, to impoverish the people by exempting national banks from the usury law, to breed discord and litigation by slicing the counties into fragments and in divers ways to occasion perplexity and expense; while the other refuses to sanction the establishment of schools, at which the little ones can receive liberal education, and the people instructed in that particular industry for which the Hills are becoming famed throughout the world. Be this as it may, both do what they can to impair the development and prosperity of the Hills, and the people naturally demand a change. Hence it is that annexation is so popular, and the movement so devoid of political or other significance save a desire for improvement. Added thereto are the many reasons cited in my previous letter, the whole combining in an argument that cannot be successfully met.

CROW DOG.

Crow Dog was to have been re-sentenced yesterday, but by consent of the district attorney the matter was indefinitely postponed upon motion of defendant's counsel, A. J. Plowman, who hopes to take the case to the United States supreme court. Lack of money is the only cause for delay, but it is believed that Crow Dog's friends, poor though they be, will succeed in raising the necessary amount. Plowman succeeded in having a clause introduced in the sundry civil appropriation bill, granting $1,000 for the purpose of carrying the case up as a test. He is not advised what action congress took in the matter, but fears that the clause was stricken out.

ORDWAY.

The poor opinion in which Gov. Ordway is held by the people of this locality by reason of his opposition to every measure for the benefit of the Hills, has not been lessened by his disregard of this and neighboring communities in making appointments. Other than the temporary office of capital commissioner no position has been tendered to any person in Western Dakota. Coupled with the fact that in filling clerical and other positions the legislature overlooked this section, the governor's slight becomes more pronounced, and the impression warranted that the Black Hills, anyway, are only the stumpiest kind of a tail to be wagged at the sweet will of the selfish dog the other side of the Missouri.

NEW LAND DISTRICTS.

By the way, I observe that congress authorized the establishment of three new land districts, two of which should be for and upon the Sioux reservation. As congress failed to ratify the treaty, the question naturally arises will the additional land offices be established? And if they are, of what earthly use will they be?

V. V. V.

Although many are predisposed to lung troubles from birth, yet even such may escape consumption, or other pulmonary or bronchial disease, if due care and watchfulness be observed, and all exciting causes are promptly treated as they arise. It is in these cases Dr. Jayne's Expectorant exercises its most beneficial effects, and has produced the largest proportion of its cures. Besides promptly removing coughs and colds, which, when left to themselves, are the immediate causes of tuberculous development, this standard remedy allays any inflammation which may exist, and by promoting easy expectoration, cleanses the lungs of the substances which clog them up, and which rapidly destroy when suffered to remain.

Polk County Journal.

H. E. COOKE, Publisher.

CROOKSTON, · MINNESOTA.

March, without being unusually disagreeable, was colder than usual, the average temperature being from ten to twelve degrees lower than last year. The previous months having been cold, winter has been disagreeably prolonged.

The "jolly" millers" are not so jolly as formerly. The milling interests at Minneapolis are greatly depressed, and the same report comes from other places. The demand for flour is merely nominal, and what caused the curious situation of affairs is a topic of discussion. But all hope for better times later in the season.

Ogontz, Jay Cooke's magnificent suburban home near Philadelphia, is to be occupied by the Chestnut street seminary, of that city. It will probably be the most luxurious and elegant boarding school for young ladies in the country, as Mr. Cooke is sparing no expense to make the already palatial building and grounds perfect for the use to which he has long intended to devote them. It is proposed that it shall be an ideal place for the thorough and broad training of the favored few who can enjoy its priviliges. Miss Eastman the principal long distinguished herself in the Buffalo High schoo by a rare faculty of bringing out whatever there was noble and elevated in her pupils, and her colleagues are all able and experienced educators.

It appears from facts and figures lately published from the New Hampshire board of health that the Yankee is disappearing from that state, During the last year there was an actual loss of 800 in the American population of that state from the excess of births over deaths. If we consider in connection with this the steady streams of emigration which carry the Yankees south and west and fill their places with Canadians and Irishmen, the conclusion is forced upon us that the year is not far away when the race that settled New Hampshire and has furnished the brain and brawn, that have made the little commonwealth famous, will have become practically extinct. But what is the loss to New Hampshire is an incalculable gain to other sections of the country. What the new races will do for the Granite State, time alone can determine.

Minnesota Capitalists and Mexico

George Hemmecker, a Mexican capitalist, is in Washington conducting certain business negotiations with ex-Senator Windom. He is one of the editors and proprietors o Libertad, the administration organ in the City of Mexico, and is here one of the government directors of the Topolabampo & Pacific railroad company, of which Windom has just been chosen president at $25,000 a year, payable for four years in stock at par. Mr. Hemmeker is also owner of the very valuable concession for the drainage of the valley of the City of Mexico. It seems probable that the company of which C. M. Loring is president and Senator Sabin director will capture the concession. They have the refusal of it until the 26th of this month, and are now treating for favorable terms. Sabin and Lowry of Minnesota and other practical hard-headed business men want the $9,000,000 paid in two or at most three years, and they would prefer Mexican 6 per cents to Mexican money. If they get the terms they want they will willingly deposit $200,000 to the credit of the republic or the owner of the concession on April 26 Just now they are trying to reach an understanding about their security for this deposit.

ST. PAUL.

FLOUR—Patents, Orange Blossom, $7; Red Cross, straights, $6.25; "Capitol" family, $5.75; XXXX, $4.50@5.50; in bbls 25c extra; outside brands, 25@50c per bbl less, according to quality. Buckwheat flour, $6@6.50 per bbl. Rye flour, $4.50 per bbl. Graham, $5 per bbl.

WHEAT—The market was very dull, there being no particular demand. Offerings were only moderate, receipts being light. Chicago was up and down in the market, but this market was not affected thereby, in the absence of trading. Prices were steadily held, but at quotations showing a slight easing off from last week's figures. No. 1 hard, $1.10 bid, $1.12 asked; May, $1.17 asked; No. 2 hard, $1.05 bid, $1.07 asked; No. 2, 98c@$1 bid.

CORN—Dull, but a little more firmly held on light receipts; No. 2, 48c bid, 52c asked; May, 54c asked; new mixed, 49c asked. Sales: 1 car No. 2, 54c.

OATS—Nothing doing in first hands. Local inquiry moderate; market fairly steady at generally unchanged quotations: No. 2 mixed, 38c bid, 40c asked; April, 39c bid, 41c asked; May, 43c asked; No. 2 white, 39c bid, 42c asked; No. 3 white, 38c bid. Sale; 1 car No. 2 mixed, last half April, 41c.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—There is no quotable alteration in prices but this staple is not selling at all well. The fact is the market has been overstocked, and while accumulations are being worked off pretty fast, buyers are not ready to load up again just yet. There is about two-fifths of the capacity of the city at work and still the daily sales do not equal the daily output. Patents are quoted at $6.50@7; straights, $5.50@6.25; clears, $5.25@5.75; low grades, $2@3.25 per bbl.

MILLSTUFFS—Bran was in a little better request yesterday. The sales of bulk on track were usually at about $10 per ton; and shorts at about $11; coarse corn meal at $17.50@19, on track; $18@19.50 f. o. b.; mixed feed, $18@19.50 on track; $18.50@21 f. o. b.

WHEAT—There was a good demand for spot and for futures yesterday. Spot No. 1 hard sold to the extent of all offered at $1.11½. Sales to arrive in ten days brought the same as spot. For May, $1.15 was bid, and $1.16 was asked. No. 2 hard brought $1.08; No. 1 Northern, $1.07@1.08; No. 2 Northern, $1.04@1.05; No. 2 was offered, at $1.02, and $1 was bid.

Although he was a democrat, Peter A. Dey has been reappointed railroad commissioner of Iowa. For a second vacancy on the board there are seventy seven applicants, and the governor is in a sad quandary.

NEWS CONDENSED.

Gossip from Washington.

It was a boomerang that Controller Lawrence playfully slung at Tom Ochiltree. He found that to refuse the latter's salary he must also refuse the president's as Arthur was indebted to the government about as bad as Ochiltree. As the president wields the appointing power, Controller Lawrence took the return whack from his boomerang with good grace, and decided that he would pay Ochiltree his salary. The decision does not include Delegate Raymond, of Dakota, on the fine-haired distinction that he is not a member of congress within the meaning of the constitution.

The department of agriculture will shortly establish near Washington an experimental farm and hospital for the treatment of domestic animals, with a view to ascertaining by a series of careful scientific experiments the causes of such diseases as Texas fever, pleuro pneumonia, etc., and what are the best methods of preventing or curing them. Experiments will be under the direction of Dr. D. E. Salmon of Asheville, N. C., a specialist who has been for some time engaged in such investigations.

The king of the Sandwich Islands, having crowned himself, proposes to have a better coinage than his kingdom has ever had before. He has asked the president whether he cannot have his gold and silver coined at our mints. The president will probably say that he can. They will add to the duties at the San Francisco, and perhaps the Philadelphia and New Orleans mints.

Sunday the United States swapped treasurers, Gilfillan going out and Wyman in. For two weeks the boys in the national money box will be busy counting the pennies and nickels to see if any stuck to Mr. Gilfillan's clothes. No count has been made in ten years, three treasurers having accepted the office without making up cash.

Attorney General Brewster expects to render his decision in regard to the date when bank taxes cease at an early day.

Rail and River News.

Gath says Northern Pacific is now a favorite stock, and Villard from having been called an adventurer three or four years ago, is now regarded as a man of more scope, united with self-respect, than any railroad spirit in this country. His temper, originally high, is said to gain patience with success. He seems to have some faith in human nature, while many of his parasites have not.

The change of the Midland railroad running from Wabasha westward to the standard gauge, and its extension to some point on the Southern Minnesota, will give the Milwaukee & St. Paul company a direct line from Eau Claire and Menomonie to the broad prairies of Iowa, Nebraska and Dakota, and the amount of business done over it will be immense.

Since March 1 no less than 161 cars of immigrants and their goods have passed through Wells, going west over the Southern Minnesota, ninety-one cars during last week.

The earnings for the Chicago & Northwestern railroad for the third week in March were: 1883, $474,806; 1882, $372,900; increase $101,900.

The trouble with the engineers of the Manitoba railroad has been settled.

Crimes and Criminals.

C. M. Mullet, a grocer at Hastings, Nebraska, was waylaid on his way home recently, by three men, who shot him in the back and robbed him of $40. Mullet died Saturday evening and was buried Sunday. Three suspicious characters were arrested four miles from Hastings and lodged in jail. On Saturday night two of them made a confession and signed it, but the third, Babcock, refused to sign and denied all knowledge.

The grand jury of New York have begun the investigation of the case of George W. Conkling, Jr., who shot and killed Wilbur H. Haverstick, and he will probably be indicted and rearrested. Recorder Smyth instructed the jury to investigate the case, and said Police Justice Smith exceeded his powers in assuming to decide that the homicide was justifiable. His action did not stop the grand jury from indicting Conkling.

In the murder case of Charles F. Kring, plaintiff in error, against the state of Missouri, the United States supreme court was by a majority of one, reversed the judgment of the supreme court of Missouri, and remanded the case for further proceedings. Kring has been tried seven times for the same murder, and by this decision is finally released from the sentence of death, which was three times imposed.

Thomas Phillips, while passing the Barnes hotel at Hampton, Va., was met by an old acquaintance, P. Joyce, who invited him to take a drink. Phillips refused to drink but accepted a cigar, and while lighting it Joyce deliberately shot him through the heart without provocation. After the shooting Joyce placed the pistol in Phillips pocket and fled. He was arrested later and lodged in jail.

W. J. Carey, a young fellow of nineteen, who in October last committed rape on a married lady at Saratoga, Winona county, Minn., and who was indicted for the crime, escaped for the time and has been vainly looked for ever since, was caught in Winona recently and put under $1,000 bonds, in default of which he was sent to jail.

Foreign News Summary.

Montreal is having a series of peculiar failures, which have gone without explanation from the local papers as to their causes. A succession of heavy collapses naturally excites some inquiry as to what lies behind them. Local and personal influences cannot usually produce such a cluster of failures. It has come to light from other sources that several of the recent failures were occasioned by the tardiness of collections in Manitoba, and by failures in Winnipeg. Merchants last fall laid in heavy stocks in anticipation of an active business during the winter.

An American named Featherstone and a man named O'Herlihy, a Parnellite, have been arrested at Cork, charged with conspiracy to murder. The postoffice is occupied by a large force of police. Threats are being made to blow up the building. One Carlody, a plasterer, has also been arrested. A fourth person fled. Documents were found upon O'Herlihy. The arrests are believed due to information given by the man arrested at Liverpool.

Three constables from Balla, Ireland, have gone to America in quest of Hynes and Vabey, who are suspected of having murdered Flerick in June, 1880. The crime created much sensation at the time, as it was believed to be a political murder. The arrest of twenty-six persons last week at Ballinrobe on charge of being accomplices in the murder has revived recollection of the crime.

An announcement in German newspapers that Germany will not allow France to steal a march on her in the adoption of rifles for her infantry causes some comment in Paris. Four battalions of German troops at Konigsberg and Stettin have already, as an experiment been armed with repeating rifles, but the results so far are discouraging.

F. E. Burnham, elected to the Manitoba parliment from Emerson, whose seat was contested on the ground of personal bribery and bribery by agents, has agreed to vacate the seat on condition of the withdrawal of charges, and an agreement to that effect has been entered into between the attorneys of the protestor and Mr. Burnham.

Lorenz Diefenbach, the eminent German scholar, is dead.

Flattering Dominion Budget.

Sir Leonard Tilley, finance minister, of the Dominion in delivering the budget speech said that the present government had reduced taxation last year $1,500,000, and paid the indebtedness for next year in the same manner. He showed by figures how working people had prospered, proving this by giving amounts of deposits in government saving banks for some time past, and also proved by figures that the country, while paying a large amount of indebtedness, had decreased its debt and lessened taxation; that the surplus for the last fiscal year was $10,000,000, and the year previous $1,000,000. Altogether the speech was received with unbounded approval, and admitted to be the most satisfactory and ablest statement ever made by any finance minister.

The Failures for Three Months.

Bradstreet's Journal furnishes the following: There were 170 failures reported to Bradstreet's during the week ending 31st twenty-six less than the preceding week, forty-one more than the corresponding week of 1882 and fifty-eight more than the same week of 1881:

Bradstreet's Journal also furnishes a record of mercantile failures for the quarter. It says the record of trade disasters for the first quarter of 1883 is a formidable one. The number is 3,189, against 2,146 and 1,986 for the first quarter of 1882 and 1881, respectively. The liabilities for this quarter foot up $42,235,535, against $29,010,944 for the same quarter last year. The total of assets for this quarter is $23,763,828, against $5,523,691 for the quarter of last year. It should be noted, however, that the percentage of assets is larger for this quarter from the fact that a few heavy failures present schedules of acknowledged assets equal, and, in one or two instances, in excess of liabilities. In the western states 975 failures for the quarter have an average liability of $15 156, the ratio of assets to liabilities being 76.3.

Another Land Decision.

Washington, Special: In the case of O. M. Cowles against the St. Paul, Minneapolis, & Manitoba Railway company, involving the s ½ of sw ¼ of sec. 31, township 137, range 42, Crookston district, the commissioner of the general land office has decided that the land, being in the indemnity limits, was excepted from the withdrawal for the company; that Cowles might make final proof on his entry after publication of notice of intention to make such proof, and that all parties who claim adversely must be governed by such notice. This is a new departure, as heretofore the railroad company has been notified of the decision of the general land office in such cases, allowed an appeal from the decision and the settlers stopped from making such proof, if the company appealed, until the question of the right to do so had been considered by the secretary of the interior upon the appeal. The publication of the notice referred to is considered a citation to all parties claiming adversely to the appeal and who object to the proof, and should the company fail to appear before, or at the time of making proof and make protest, their rights in the premises will be concluded, unless they can satisfactorily explain the neglect to so appear. It will therefore be necessary for the railroad company to subscribe liberally for the newspapers and read the advertisements carefully.

Work of the Civil Service Reform Commission.

Dorman B. Eaton the head of the reform commission has the following to say with reference to the work in hand before the civil service commission:

Removals are not considered by or in any way under the control of the commission, nor is the tenure of office. The latter is indirectly and wholesomely affected by the fact that as the political motive for removing A. who is a good man, is generally to make a place for B. the temptation to make or cause to be made is removed, when B cannot directly be appointed to A's place, but must take his chance on the competitive lists. Another point is that as the lists are public the mere fact of going upon them is generally assurance that a man's record is right, as he exposes himself to the criticism not only of the public but those who have personal reasons for preventing an improper appointment. All examinations will be in writing and the record preserved, so that the appeals can be heard by the commission at any time.

During Mr. Eaton's experience under Grant in this district there was not but one appeal, and the appellant withdrew that upon the examiners appearing and explaining the reason for their action. Mr. Eaton, in reply to a question, said in effect that about 10,000 would be under the supervision of the commission so far as the requirement of examination by applicants for vacancies are concerned. These include all the departments in Washington, except that laborers are exempt, and also those appointments—some 300—where the confirmation of the senate is necessary.

An Old Time Diner Out.

An ancient gentleman, who has outlived his early friends and contemporaries, was met a few evenings ago going out to dine and wished him a pleasant time. "A pleasant time!" he repeated, with his faltering smile and far away look. "Why, I go simply as a matter of duty; to keep people that ever heard of me from thinking I'm dead and buried long ago; so that when I'm dead they'll not be at the trouble of inquiring who it is, or mistaking me for the corpse of some other man. Ah! it is a sad thing to outlive friends, and manners and customs—even the style of eating! I do not go out now to eat; I make it a point to get what I need before I start, and merely go through the form of tasting all the dishes brought in, a la Russe. In my youth we sat down to a warm, comfortable, not too gorgeous table, with not too many at it for enjoyment, and saw our food carved and dealt out before our eyes, and had our appetite whetted by its savory odor before we tasted it. But now, only the cook and waiter know the mysteries to which we are treated—cold!"

NEWS OF THE STATE.

New Surveyor General of Minnesota.

The president has appointed Martin S. Chandler of Red Wing, Goodhue county, to be surveyor-general of Minnesota, at the instance of Senator McMillan. Martin Spencer Chandler was born Feb. 14, 1824, at Jamestown, N. Y. In 1856 he came to Minnesota, and opened a farm at Pine Island, Goodhue county. In the fall of 1858 he was elected sheriff and held the place twenty years. He was a presidential elector in 1872 and was chosen messenger to carry the vote of the state to Washington, but declined in favor of W. L. Wilson of St. Paul. Last fall he was elected to the state senate in the 22d district and voted for Mr. Windom for senator to the last.

The state capitol is about completed with the exception of the towers.

R. B. Langdon bought the glorious first seat in the Grand Opera house at Minneapolis for the sum of $250.

In the district court at Winona, Ida Stevens, larceny, was sentenced to twenty-four months in jail; James Dougherty, stealing a coat, eighteen months in the penitentiary; Carl McCormick, found guilty of manslaughter in the fourth degree for the killing of Jacob A. Rose, was sentenced to State prison for the term of two years, being the full limit prescribed by law; Henry Fleck, assault with deadly weapon, Stillwater one year, Henry W. Shulties of Fargo, Dak., was arrested by Deputy United States Marshal Tuesday at Kankauna, Wis., on a charge of falsely representing himself to be a revenue officer of the United States, and receiving bribes for reporting infractions of the law. He was sentenced to six months in the Milwaukee house of correction.

C. G. Riley, who was charged with deserting a girl and creditors in Lake City, writes from Burnham, Tex., that the charges are false; that agents owe him $1,600, while he only owes $10 on orders for pictures, which he is completing. He denies that he married a girl and deserted her, asserts that his leaving Lake City was without secrecy and that those making the false charges must stand the consequences.

Darius White, an old and respected citizen of Northfield, died in that city on Wednesday, aged sixty-two.

The friends of Red Rock camp meeting ground throughout the state met at Jackson street M. E. church, St. Paul, to plan for the near future of this already successful place of religious resort. The trustees have asked the railway company to give them $2,000 with which to erect a hotel or boarding house, and they are having the plans prepared for a pavillion. It is estimated the improvements to be made by the association and lot holders this year will reach from $7,000 to $10,000. It was voted to engage Rev. Thomas Harrison, "the boy preacher," Chaplain McCabe and Amanda Smith, if she returned from her trip around the world in time.

At Fergus Falls, recently, a switch engine on the Manitoba road struck a wagon on the Summit avenue crossing, completely demolishing the vehicle and seriously injuring three ladies, occupants thereof. Miss Esther Hutchison had her arm so badly crushed that it had to be amputated above the elbow, while her mother and sister were severely bruised and cut.

The biennial report of state Librarian Taylor to Gov. Hubbard states that 849 volumes were saved from the fire, 3,899 have been added since by purchase, 4,634 by donation, and 370 by exchange, making the total 9,752 volumes.

A Woman's Good Name Vindicated.

The district court has been engaged in the trial of the case of Mrs. Addie K. Bush vs. W. V. Lucas and A. B. Lucas, publishers of the Cerro Gordo Republican, for libel. Mrs Bush claimed damages to her character from a publication made in the paper charging her with lack of chastity, by innuendo, with having a quarrelsome disposition, etc. On the defense no attempt was made to justify the charge of unchastity, but it was denied. After a four days' trial the jury returned a verdict of $500 for the plaintiff. The trial caused much interest, owing to the prominence of the parties, the defendant Lucas being the late auditor of the state. The verdict is generally accepted in the community as just, and as a complete vindication of the plaintiff from the malicious charges.

The theory of Romberg, that neuralgia is the prayer of the suffering nerve for healthy blood and more of it, is now generally received by physicians.

HARD LIFE ON THE ROAD.

The Exciting Lives of the Fighters Who Accompany the Circus.

New York Star.

"Yes, it has been a booming season for some of the shows; but some of them, on the other hand, have gone to pieces," said a well-known advance agent in Union square, the other day. "You see," he continued, "the big fish have swallowed up the little fish and there has been a good deal of squirming."

"But can you tell me what a "hustler" is, and what he has to do with the services of a circus?" queried the Star reporter.

"What do you know about a "hustler" young man?"

"Only this," said the reporter, displaying the following advertisement from a sportive paper:

WANTED—Forty more first-class bill-posters for United Shows. We have already secured seventy good men, but as we anticipate sixty day's opposition this spring, right on the start, we want forty more reliable bill-posters. They must be good war workers, true to their employers, hustlers, and ready day or night, for any emergency. Not afraid to fight for their side if it should become necessary to protect their rights. Only those who are well-known bill-posters need apply. We want no lithographers or programmers. To the right kind of men long engagements and liberal wages will be paid. Want none but sober, reliable men. Consider two weeks' silence a respectful negative. Apply immediately to——.

"Well, that is a pretty bold advertise," said the man of sawdust, "but 'hustlers' must be had, and I don't know of any better way of getting them. People who go to circus shows in the city have no idea of the trials we have to encounter in out-of-the-way country places. Not only is there the competition of rival companies, but the countrymen; although they will come any distance to see the show, seem to look upon the show people as their natural enemies outside of the canvas. It is necessary, therefore, for every company to carry with it a number of strong fellows, who, as this advertisement says, are 'not afraid to fight for their side if it should become necessary to protect their rights.'"

"You mean to say, then, that the circus companies carry fighters with them?"

"Of course. Why, when a circus man goes off to some of the out-of-the way places in the west and southwest he takes his life in his hands. Tody Hamilton used to tell a story of his adventures in a town somewhere in Texas. The show had a large crowd at both the day and evening performances, but many negroes of the vicinity had tried to force their way in without paying. On being ejected, they vowed vengeance. It was evident when the time came for striking the tents that there would be trouble. The night was pitchy dark and torches was lighted outside the tents. It was seen that little knots of negroes had gathered and were watching the proceedings with sullen expression. The circus men knew what was coming and prepared for action. A tent was never struck much quicker than that. It was folded, packed and placed in the wagons, when there was a movement among the negroes. The circus men knew that the moment for action had come. Almost in the twinkling of an eye the torches were extinguished, and in the stillness of the night came the sound of the sickening thud of the tent men as they descended upon the negroes' heads. Each tent-man had selected the negro he was to attack, and silently and swiftly the work was done and the circus moved out of town before daybreak. Tody used to say that six negroes were left dead on the field, and that the show people were not prosecuted, because it would have been impossible to have identified the killers. It was certainly a case of the lives of the circus people against those of the negroes, and the circus people did not propose to take any chances. This was one of the most serious circus fights that has occurred in some time, but every season there are a greater or less number of these encounters which never get into papers, and the show folk have learned to go prepared. So you see, young man, a 'hustler' is a very useful element in the interior economy of a circus."

Matrimonial Eccentricities.

We recollect a wedding at which the happy pair had no sooner been united than, to the amazement of every one except the officiating clergyman, who had been let into the secret a few minutes before being the eldest brother of the bride advanced with one of the blushing bridesmaids, and requested that the ceremony should be repeated for their behoof. It appearing that all necessary legal and other preliminaries had been duly arranged, the demand was complied with, and the company had to celebrate two weddings instead of one.

This recalls the case of an enterprising Scotch widow, who, failing the appearance at the eventful moment of her intended second husband, utilized the occasion, the clergyman and the company in a way which must call forth the admiration of the most skilled diplomatists. She was a bouncing young widow of twenty-five, and had agreed to marry "No. 2," as she playfully termed him, in a year and a day from the demise of "No. 1." The happy day fell on a Wednesday, and the ceremony was to take place at the bride's house. A magnificent wedding feast was provided, and about sixty guests invited. The hour fixed for the marriage was 6 p. m. In the forenoon, the bridegroom arrayed himself in his best, and went off to invite a few friends in the country who had been overlooked. Whether he happened to take with him a copy of the "Pickwick Papers," and come across Mr. Weller's famous advice to his son Sam on the subject of "vidders," will probably never be known; but by this or some other means, he appears to have been reduced to a peculiarly vacillating state of mind with regard to the important step he was about to take; for by the afternoon post his bride-elect received from him an intimation to the effect that he had conscientious scruples as to marrying a woman so recently widowed. He would make it a matter of careful consideration, and abide by the result of his subsequent feelings. She was not to take this as a positive declinature; but if he had not arrived by six o'clock she might consider the marriage off. The widow did not faint or go into hysterics, but decked herself in her bridal robes, and smilingly received the guests who had been bidden to the feast. When all the company had arrived, the lady read to them the communication she had received from the recreant bridegroom. Loud and long were the denunciations it elicited, and the heroic bearing of the widow under such trying circumstances was marked and commended by all. "This need not prevent the feast," she said; and the banqueting began. The feasting over, the room was cleared for dancing, and everything went as merrily as if the wedding had passed off under the most favored auspices. The result of it all was that an elderly bachelor, who had opened the ball with the irrepressible widow, became so enamored of her that before the evening was far advanced he had proposed, and, what was more, had been accepted. The minister was recalled; and at 11 P. M. the wedding, though not the one for which the guests had been assembled, was solemnized. The ceremony had scarcely been performed, when the door bell was violently rung, and in stalked the superceded bridegroom. "Careful consideration" had at length overcame his "conscientious scruples," and he had come back to claim his bride—only, however, to be introduced to her as the wife of another. Served him right.

The very act of marrying at all is in some instances a most eccentric proceeding. What, for example, could be more absurd than the recent marriage, in a small agricultural village in England, of a couple whose united ages came to 158, the bridegroom being seventy-seven and the bride eighty-one? Nor was this the only peculiar feature of this extraordinary union. The bridegroom's Christian name was Thomas and the bride's Mary, and this was the third Mary that had selected as his partner, while it was also the third Thomas to whom Mary had been united by the conjugal bond. To crown all, both were in receipt of parochial relief to the extent of two shillings and a loaf each per week.—Chambers' Journal.

Things in General.

Latin in a drug store must come down. The green boy learning the druggist's trade has too good a chance to poison customers by mistake where everything is covered by a language he does not understand. Medicine should be taken in straight English.—New Orleans Picayune.

There is so much general cigarette smoking among the children of the Philadelphia schools that a treatise on the danger of the habits has been granted by the board of education and pasted inside the cover of the text book of every pupil.

Advertising manufacturers of patent medicines seems to be growing into a mania, and enormous sums are spent in every way to attract public attention. One of the best known of the New York advertising agents recently said that his contract with a Baltimore firm for newspaper advertising alone called for $68,000 monthly, to say nothing of the thousands expended in the purchase of show cards, pictures, lithographs, handbills, etc.

The Baltimore American points with pride to the fact that the grain trade of that port has greatly increased since the beginning of the year. The receipts of wheat in January and February amounted to 2,207,306 bushels an increase of 1,635,768 bushels over the corresponding time in 1882, and the receipts of corn were 3,531,268 bushels, against only 495,905 bushels in the same months last year. The entire exports of corn in 1882 were only 1,345,418 bushels. The first ten days of March show a similar increase. The receipts at New York have increased 50 per cent. those at Baltimore 700 per cent.

The custom of saving seats in railroad cars is not unusual, yet some people seem to have a doubt of its propriety. A few days ago this doubt was actively expressed upon a road passing through one of the suburbs, the method of expression being perhaps somewhat peculiar. A passenger who had filled an empty seat with parcels and papers with the evident intention of signifying its reservation was surprised by the removal of the packages by another passenger. "This seat is saved," was the polite objection. "I'll take it," was the rather abrupt rejoinder. "But I'm expecting a friend." "Your friend can take another seat." "If my friend comes I shall request you to remove your seat." "If your friend comes I shall keep this seat. I don't approve of saving seats for a short distance." And possession proved to be "nine points of the law," but there wasn't any friendship lost between those two passengers.

Several months ago a check for the salary due him was sent from Washington to an officer of the United States Geological survey, who had it cashed by the nearest post trader. The latter made it over to one of his creditors, and it slowly came east, passing through several hands and in time reaching this city, where it went through the Clearing House and whence it was sent to Messrs. Riggs & Co., of Washington, for collection, being drawn upon the United States treasurer. When presented in the cashroom for payment the other day it was discovered that the check had not been signed by the distributing officer who drew it, but of all the persons and banks whose endorsements covered its back not one had noticed the lack of a signature. At last, after all its wanderings, the disbursing officer signed the check and Riggs & Co., received the money.

Dr Frederick R. Sturgis read a paper before the New York academy of medicine recently upon the regulation of social vice, in which, while he claimed that the British contagious disease act had been of "decided service," in Germany the number of clandestine woman had increased with prevalence of disease. Moreover the law tended to depopulate the countries by checking marriage and delaying it. Dr. Barker and Judge Brady recognized the futility of legislation against public sentiment. Dr. Sturgis estimated the number of public women in New York at 11,318, and said of late years there was an increasing number of young women leading lives of vice.

Supreme Court Brains.

Boston Journal's Washington Letter.

Our highest tribunal holds its daily sessions in the old senate chamber and listens with becoming gravity (with the exception of one or two judges who will snooze), while well paid counsel are eloquently discoursing on the wrongs or the claims of their respective constituents. Chief Justice Waite wears well, and he is not only a good lawyer and a good judge, but he is gifted with a large share of common sense. Mr. Justice Miller is learned in the law and the possessor of a quick and keen insight into the problems which the court is called upon to solve. Mr. Justice Field's moral perceptions are blunted by his presidential aspirations, but he is strong on mining cases and questions relating to the public lands. Mr. Justice Bradley is eminently judicial and intellectual. Mr. Justice Harlan is the possessor of great mental powers and a wide range of legal knowledge. Mr. Justice Woods, who represents the South on the bench, has paid considerable attention to the jurisprudence based on the old French and Spanish law. Messrs. Justices Matthews, Gray and Blatchford are more recent, yet none the less valuable acquisitions to the court of supreme jurisdiction. The court will soon break up, and the justices will manage to transact some of their summer business at Long Branch or Newport.

The war department occasionally receives petitions for the discharge of Sergt. Mason but nothing has yet been done about it, and the president, so far as can be learned, has taken no steps toward the exercise of executive clemency to relieve him from the eight year's imprisonment.

East Grand Forks Facts.

Investigation showed the cause to be a harmless cartridge, which had been carried in the pocket with the tobacco. It was indeed, a narrow escape.

Ancient Classics for English Readers.

This is the title of a unique and readily delightful series of books, the first volume of which, "The Commentaries of Cæsar," by Anthony Trollope, is just issued. The aim of the series is to open to the unlearned English reader the beauties and treasures of classic lore, tell who the writers were, give some connected outline of the story they narrate, present some of their most striking passages in choice English translation, and illustrate them with the wealth of modern scholarship. There are 27 volumes in all, and heretofore they have cost $1.00. They are publishing in The Elzevir Library, in really charming style, at 15 cents each for paper binding, or 30 cents for cloth binding. "Herodotus," by george S. Swayne; "Cicero," by W. L. Collins, and "Demosthenes," W. J. Brodribb, are announced for immediate issue, and the other volumes are to follow, one or more each week, until the series is complete. From even these marvelously low prices large discounts are offered to clubs and for prompt orders. John B. Alden, Publisher, 18 Vesey Street, New York.

IMPROVEMENTS

IN AND ABOUT

CROOKSTON

SOME DETAILS ABOUT THE PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS ON

Sampson's Addition!

The Direct Benefits to Crookston Secured Through the Crookston

Improvement Company.

The people of Crookston, familiar with the plat of the city and the immediate vicinity, know at a glance the strip of ground directly across the river on the west, in the shape of a horse shoe, with the front part adjoining the business portion of the city of Crookston, and separated from it by the Red Lake River only. This land, some seventy or eighty acres, is surrounded on more than three sides by the river, lays high and dry, some of it over fifty feet above the river, is a natural forest with considerable valuable building timber and several thousand cords of wood, if cut down, and altogether a natural park, needing only some clearing up, and has a river frontage of over a mile and a half, and within three blocks of the post office and two blocks from the depot.

Any one familiar with the location and its exceedingly natural adaptability for residence and business, especially everything that comes under the head of manufacturing, will wonder why this has not been long ago improved and made a part of the city proper. The answer is simply because it has been isolated from the city, owing to the lack of bridge facilities whereby people from the west have been compelled to make a long detour to cross the wagon bridge east of the railroad track.

It remained for our townsman, Hon. Bernhard Sampson to solve the question and he has done it very practically, too, and in a manner that will prove very advantageous and beneficial to Crookston. Mr. Sampson is not much of a talker, but a hard and indefatigable worker, and not being in the State Legislature this past winter, he has been devoting his time to the crystalization of his plans, and these are now sufficiently advanced to justify the statement in detail.

First of all, Mr. Sampson interested some active and practical monied men from St. Paul, and the result was the formation of the "Crookston Improvement Company," of which Mr. Sampson is president. This company's capital is twenty-five thousand dollars, and are the proprietors of the property in question, which is being platted and known as "Sampson's Addition to Crookston." The Crookston Improvement Company proposes to improve the property by clearing out superfluous timber, grade streets, and guarantees a bridge across the river at the foot of Robert street, by which the center or Sampson's addition will be brought within five minutes walk of the post office. Mr. Sampson vouches for the statement that the price of lots will be within the reach of all, especially of men with limited and stated incomes, and liberal inducements will be given to all who buy with a purpose to build. The locaton is particularly favorable for the large number of railroad men who make Crookston their homes. The next move was the organization by the same parties of a Flouring Mill Co., with fifty thousand dollars working capital. The mill, 250 barrels capacity a day, will be built this season, work already begun on Sampson's Addition, directly opposite the water power. A large foundry and machine shops, the main building 60x150 feet is also secured for the same location.

Negotiations are progressing favorably for a straw paper mill, also a sash, door and blind factory and planing mill, all to be located on Sampson's Addition. Arrangements are also completed, or agreed upon, by which the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad Co., will put in a spur track, at a point on the south side of the river, to run under the bank below Mr. Sampson's residence, and follow the south and west bank of the river to a point within a block of the west end of the bridge in Sampson's addition, to facilitate the movement of freight to and from the several mills, foundry and factories.

This is in brief the outline of what the Crookston Improvement Company has accomplished, and projected during its brief existence of hardly a month, and the prime mover in the entire project from its inception has been our friend Sampson. To carry out the improvements contemplated, involves an expenditure this season of over $100,000, a great part of which will be paid out for labor and material right here and which, when completed, will give permanent employment to upwards of a hundred mechanics and laborers.

The Crookston Improvement Company is also negotiating with parties to come here and build a barrel factory to whom liberal inducements are offered. They argue, and very correctly, that here at Crookston, where water power can be had at a nominal price and where the raw material is almost on the ground in great abundance, and cheap, is the right spot to plant a barrel factory, and it is estimated that the flouring mills, within a radious of fifty miles of Crookston have even now a daily requirement of over five hundred barrels and being a railroad center, with roads north, south, east and west a barrel factory could supply the market promptly, and at a considerably less price than Minneapolis factories, as the saving in freight alone would be a very respectable item on the right side of the ledger.

The plat of Sampson's addition shows the liberal and broad gauge principle of the proprietors, in wide streets, and a very large number of lots having river frontage, and from 50 to 75 feet fronts by 150 and up to 250 feet deep. The order for lumber and other material for the flour mill has already been given, and timber for the foundation is now on the ground, and work will begin as soon as practicable.

Mr. Sampson and his associates believe in taking their own medicine and that in liberal doses, in inaugurating their substantial improvements instead of laying out a paper addition and "booming" it, pocketing the proceeds, we cannot but congratulate the people of Crookston on the good example set by the Crookston Improvement Company, and it is now in order for others to step up to the front and do likewise.

No lots have yet been offered for sale, but we understand from Mr. Sampson, that plats will be ready for exhibition about the 15th, when prospective purchasers will be shown the handsomest, and cheapest property ever offered in Crookston. Terms of payment will be made to suit the views of the purchasers who may wish to build.

We wish to say to any man not familiar with the geography of the Great Northwest, to procure a map of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Rail road, follow its main line northwest from St. Paul, then let your eye rest on Crookston, the county seat of Polk County, Minnesota, in the heart of the famous Red River Valley. Please note the railway center of Crookston, north to St. Vincent and Winnipeg, south to St. Paul, east to Duluth, west to the Devil's Lake and Turtle Mountain country. Observe the source in Red Lake, to the east of the Red Lake River, passing through Crookston, giving direct communication with the limitless forests and pineries around Red Lake and towards Lake Superior to the east, and Lake of the Woods to the north, and see the branch line from Crookston to St. Hilaire, on its way to the Lake of the Woods. Examine the inexhaustible rich soil of Polk County of which Crookston is the geographical center, and then give some attention to our water power. Form an acquaintance with our enterprising and progressive people, and see if Crookston does not offer substantial inducements for your abilities and capital.

Song of the Dennet Harvester.

STEENERSON BROTHERS, AGENTS.

To my many friends and patrons,
And to men who buy and sell
All kinds of farming implements;
I would my story tell;
But directly to the farming class,
Upon whom we all depend,
I address myself especially,
And to them my message send:
I wish to tell how strong I am
In every limb and joint,
I'm made of lumber, iron and steel,
Well finished at every point,
And if you wish to test my strength,
And see how light I draw,
I'll meet my neighbors anywhere
And manipulate the straw.
For competition's the life of trade,
And I ask for no reward
Unless I am deserving,
And it comes of your free accord;
How true is the song of the Sages—
Years like phantoms fly—
The same is often said of me,
As I go whizzing by.
I'm known in sunshine and showers
Always to be the same,
And warrant what I advertise—
To reap ALL kinds of grain.
I do not wish to praise myself,
For you all know what I've done,
Just read my record of Seventy-six,
And then of Eighty-one.
I started in the field of strife,
The laurels bright to gain,
Perseverance was my motto,
And ONWARD's been my aim.
Who ever heard of "BUCKEYE?"
Well I'll tell you what I know—
She's called an elephant on wheels,
And lives in O-h-i-o;
A kind of second cousin
To "OSBORN" and the "WOOD"—
One of the aspiring "would-be's"
That's counted as "no good."
Everything finds its level,
On this terrestial sphere—
Poor "OSBORN" KNOWS, beyond a doubt,
For she stands all out of gear.
Four-in-hand, "ESTERLY'S" "TALLY-HO,"
With anxious looking face,
Comes lumbering up beside me,
With elephantine grace;
Always to hear my parting words;
Farewell, friend Esterly—you know,
"Life's short"—"Time is fleeting,"
And you go too horrid slow;
Turn out your fiery steeds to grass,
Be wise—curtail expenses,
And join poor "EMPIRE" patient friend,
In holding up the fences.
How often do we hear it said
That "every dog has its day;"
Even MINNEAPOLIS, CHAMPION and McCORMICK,
Are quietly passing away;
Their merits have been tested—
We all know what they'er worth,
A Destiny has shaped their end—
Their level is the turf;
They are among the unfortunates
Going to their rest.
Dropped out so willingly,
Because it is the best
I'M THE OLDEST AND ONLY LIVE MACHINE
I'm what they call "the stuff;"
I cut, bind, elevate, discharge,
AND NEVER TAKE A BLUFF—
No matter what my duties are,
I never over-tax;
I use most any kind of twine—
Manila, Hemp or Flax;
My virtues are a shining light,
I'm the only one of fame,
Even at royal banquets
TOASTS ARE GIVEN TO MY NAME.
In short, you will find me true and strong,
In every spot and place,
And I'll do your harvest so nicely
You'll smile all over your face
But if you wish to buy me,
Don't delay your order too long,
For quick trades are always made with me,
In a day I come and am gone.
And whoever invests his money on me,
To him I'll prove to the end
The best, most earnest toiler.
A FAITHFUL ENDURING FRIEND.

[47-49] STEWART & LAWRENCE.

Article of Incorporation of the Crookston Improvement Company.

Know all men by these presents, that the undersigned, Bernhard Sampson, of Crookston, Minn., Iver Tharaldson, of Grand Forks, Dakota Territory, Julius Bjornstad, of St. Paul, Minn., Frederick J. Wilcken, of St. Paul, Minn. and Aleck E. Johnson, of St. Paul, Minn., and such other persons as may hereinafter associate themselves with them, have agreed to associate, and do hereby associate themselves for incorporation and to become incorporated under and pursuant to the laws of the State of Minnesota, and more particularly under the provisions of Title 2, of Chapter 34, of the General statutes of Minnesota, and all acts amendatory thereof, and for that purpose have adopted and signed the following articles of incorporation:

ARTICLE ONE.

The name of this corporation hereby formed is "The Crookston Improvement Company." The general nature of its business shall be the buying, owning, improving, selling and dealing in lands, tenements and hereditaments, and the laying out, platting, purchasing and selling townsites and additions, and to buying, owning, improving, selling and dealing in town lots.

The principal place of transacting the business of said corporation shall be in Crookston, Minn.

ARTICLE TWO.

This corporation shall commence on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1883, and shall continue for a period of thirty years thereafter.

ARTICLE THREE.

The amount of capital stock of said corporation shall be $25,000, which shall be divided into 500 shares of $50 each, and shall be paid in upon demand of the Board of Directors.

ARTICLE FOUR.

The highest amount of indebtedness or liability to which said corporation shall at any time be subject, shall be the sum of $5,000.

ARTICLE FIVE.

The government of the corporation and the management of its affairs shall be vested in a board of five directors, out of whose number and by whom one shall be elected President, and one Secretary and Treasurer of the Corporation, and such President and Secretary shall be ex-officio President and Secretary of the board of directors.

The board of directors shall be elected annually by the stockholders, at the annual meeting of the corporation, to be held on the 1st Tuesday of May, in each and every year.

ARTICLE SIX.

Bernhard Sampson, Iver Tharaldson, Julius Bjornstad, Frederick J. Wilcken and Aleck E. Johnson shall constitute the first board of directors of said corporation, and Bernhard Sampson shall be the first president of the corporation and Iver Tharaldson the first secretary and treasurer of the corporation, and said directors and officers shall hold their offices until the next annual meeting of the corporation, to be held on the first Tuesday in May, A. D. 1883.

In testimony whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals this 1st day of March, A. D. 1883.

BERNHARD SAMPSON, [SEAL.]

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of one hundred and ninety-six 72-100 dollars, which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Thomas Lambert and Josephine Lambert, his wife, to Carl Kretzschmar, bearing date the 26th day of November, A. D. 1881, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 28th day of November, A. D. 1881, at 1:10 o'clock p. m., in book "B" of Mortgages, on page 553, to secure the payment of one certain promissory note, dated Nov. 26th, 1881, made by said Thomas Lambert and Josephine Lambert, whereby they promised to pay to the order of Carl Kretzschmar the sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars with interest at ten per cent. per annum until paid, payable one year after date, and no action or proceeding at law or otherwise having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: The northwest quarter (¼) of Section number twenty-four (24) in Township number one hundred and fifty (150), Range forty-six (46), in Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, will be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House in the City of Crookston in said County and State, on the thirteenth day of April, A. D. 1883, at ten o'clock a. m. of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated February 27th, A. D. 1883,

CARL KRETZSCHMAR,
Mortgagee.

WM. WATTS, Attorney for Mortgagee. [44-50]

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, APRIL 12.

Fine April showers last night and to-day.

School closes this week for the short term.

Fred Reynolds has returned to civilization and seems glad to get back.

Latest and finest styles in wall paper at Van Gieson's.

Wm. Box has his hotel fixed up and running in good shape.

The city recorder's office is now up stares in the Bankrupt store building.

W. W. Wilson of Red Lake Falls gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday.

The new meat market on Main Street is in full blast. See new ad elsewhere.

G. M. Barber & Co., having purchased Wm. Guse's sample room is fixing it up for a drug store.

Rumor says that Thor Haatvadt will bring home a bride with him when he returns. Here's Ho, Thor!

High and dry! Lots in Sampson's Addition of course. Leech & McManus will sell Monday next.

August Peterson, a real estate dealer of Albert Lee, is looking over our city with business in his eye.

Sidewalks and streets are called for and will be established on Sletten & Cromb's Addition at once.

Beautiful Woodland lots in Sampson's Addition. Call at the Red Star Office, Broadway, on Monday

A. C. Wilmot, of Ada, was in the city on Wednesday on business connected with his school furniture agency.

Geo. Warninger will commence his new residence soon. Jos. Netzer has the job. The building is to be a fine one.

J. L. Bailey is building a grocery store just north of his present site. He will build a feed store behind the grocery story.

D. Jacobus intends to have the post-office removed to the building just moved south of the Bankrupt store on Saturday.

The Eiken Brothers are putting in a branch hardware store at St. Hilaire. The building is being erected and will be 24x60.

Mrs. I. Brin has returned from her visit east and will soon have the finest display of spring millinery ever brought to the city.

Albert LaChapelle is on the streets boasting of his fine crop of No. 1 Hard, just cradled—it is a boy and weighs 62 pounds to the bushel.

J. P. Nelson, of Warren, was looking over us on Wednesday. He has just returned from a pleasant trip to Cuba, Florida and other foreign shores.

Land Commissioner, A. E. Johnson, accompanied by Mr. Brandt, of the Nordvestern, St. Paul, put up at the Box hotel last Saturday and Sunday.

The council will meet the Crookston Improvement Co. on Saturday evening to receive the plat of the new addition and consider other business propositions.

Towns always grow westward and around the manufacturing centre. Then gaze on Sampson's Addition Leech & McManus will sell you lots on Monday.

Warninger & Trombley are papering their sample room with the finest paper they could find in St. Louis T. N. Seager is putting it on and it will be a splendid job.

The real estate boomer, Holmes, of Red Lake Falls, was in the city last week enjoying our boom to the fullest extent. Holmes is a rattler when he gets waked up.

Jake Francis has rented his house and will soon go out to live on his farm. His father-in-law and family have arrived from Faribault Co., to make their home here.

Johnson Bros. & Wing have just received a large stock of wall paper which is superb. They are selling crockery regardless of cost to make room for new goods. Call early. (50-tf)

Sampson's Addition with its encircling river, woodland parks and gentle slopes overlooking the city is the finest residence property in the valley Leech & McManus will sell Monday next.

Early on Monday morning Chris Houston was rustling about on the streets setting up the cigars all on account of a little bare-footed tender foot that had arrived at his house in the night. It is a girl and Chris says "it is a daisy."

Beecher & George have fitted up the upper story of Medical Hall with a view to renting for offices. They have put up an outside stairway rendering access easy. This is a good chance to secure an office elegibly located.

Messrs. Stewart & Lawrence inform us that they have contracted to supply the Crookston Roller Mill Company 116,000 feet of pine lumber for the new mill accross the river. It will make about ten carloads. That looks like business don't it?

Jos. Brewster, of Fisher, was in the city on Monday for the purpose of filing on a forty acre tract that lies in the limits of the village of Fisher. The land has been supposed to belong to the railroad company which accounts for its long rest. Joseph tells us that the Moraus farmers will begin seeding this week.

The Polk County Driving Association met pursuant to adjournment and it was decided to dissolve the Association which was done and a new one immediately organized and named the Crookston Agricultural Association. The officers elected are, S. L. Dobson, President, H. E. Cooke, Vice President, John McLean, Secretary, W. M. Ross, Treasurer. Directors, S. L. Dobson, John McLean, W. H. Jennings, K. D. COUNCIL PROCEEDINGS.

COUNCIL CHAMBERS,
Crookston, April 16th, 1883.

The new council met promptly, on time and Mayor Stuart delivered his message, as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CITY COUNCIL: I deem it proper at this time to offer some recommendations relating to the proper management of our city affairs. To insure good government we must have good, efficient and trustworthy officers; to that end I have selected and recommend the following: For Marshal, D. F. McDonald, for Deputy Marshal, Ben McKinney, Street Commissioner, Jas. Butler, City Attorney, John N. Ives; Engineer, W. D. Hurlbut. I have appointed committees as follows:

On streets, alleys and sidewalks, the aldermen from each ward, in their respective wards.

On finance, H. M. Pierce and Wm. Box:

Fire department, A. Braley, H. Nolan and Isadore Fortier,

Ordinances, N. P. Stone, H. I. Hanscome and Ole Bang.

Board of Health, Ansel Bates, D. Brower and Dr. C. E. Dampier.

The salary of the city recorder is insufficient and I would recommend that it be increased to $500 per annum.

Respectfully submitted:

W. H. STUART, Mayor.

Action being taken upon appointment of Marshal, Dan McDcDonald was duly appointed with Ben McKinney, deputy; John N. Ives was appointed city attorney, W. D. Hurlbut, city engineer and Jas. Butler, street commissioner The salary of recorder was fixed at $500 per annum. The recorder with H. M. Pierce and H. I. Hanscome were appointed a committee to make a detailed statement of the city debt to date. The Marshal was instructed to put a pine railing across the hall, remove the platform and furnish a large table for the use of the council.

Bonds of city treasurer, A. G. Gallasch, city justices, G. W. Lewis and Jas. W. Lilly, constable, T. H. Bjoin, were presented and approved. A committee on settlement with city treasurer consisting of the recorder, A. Braley, and Ole Bang were appointed. City attorney, F. A. Dufour, submitted an itemized statement which was accepted and bill of $350 ordered. Petitions from Pine Street, Main Street, Broadway, Elm Street and Hurlbut Street for sidewalks and grading referred to the proper committees, as also was the petition of L. Touchelle for abatement of taxes Petition of J. G. McGrew for bridge across river at Robert Street referred to Box, Stone, Nolan and Hanscome. Ordered that all petitions be referred to the proper committees before action by the council excepting in cases requiring suspension of rules The recorder was instructed to advertise for bids for sidewalks, grading and for city printing. The matter of conflicting ordinances relating to sidewalks was referred to the city attorney. Matter of filling a lake referred to Braley and Stone. Salary of city attorney fixed at $350 per annum. John Freeborn was appointed poundmaster. In the metter of meetings it was decided that the next regular meeting be held on Tuesday evening April 24th at 7:30 and each succeeding fortnight thereafter until further orders. Adjourned.

Hack & Gallasch have "cleaned house" and are now ready to receive their friends.

Isadore Fortier intends to move his building and prepare for putting up a large brick building at the corner of Broadway and Robert Street.

Notice for proposals.

From the Messenger.

Mrs. C. Kretzschmar is rapidly recovering from the accident that has laid her up.

Mr. Hamery, of Delling, Hayes & Hamery, is expected here within a few days, with his family.

Dow & Brunelle's new sale and livery barn which is commenced on the corner west of Langevin & Son's store, will be 100x80 feet.

Jos. Barrete, proprietor of the stage line between here and Crookston, will soon put on a daily hack and use four horses instead of two.

Octave Champagne proposes to cater to the wants of our citizens in the bread, cake and confectionery line. He is building near the new west side hotel, a neat bakery and will occupy it by June 1st.

We are informed on good authority, that the cloud which has hung over the title to Champagne & Dow's addition is now removed, and a perfect title is now given to purchasers of lots in that portion of town.

We learn that Minneapolis parties have shipped from that place a large steam saw mill to this point, and will operate it on the Clearwater River within the village limits. The owners have purchased from Walker Bros., two million feet of pine logs, and expect them here by the time the mill is ready to run. This will help wonderfully in our building operations while our water powers are being improved.

One of the most notable improvements on the South side is the large hotel at the corner of Fifth and Main Streets, in Champagne & Dow's addition, ground for which was broken yesterday; all the material including brick, is on the ground, and construction will be pushed as rapidly as possible. It is expected the main building will be ready for occupancy by July 1st. It will have a frontage on Main Street of 70x30 feet in depth and the two wings will each be 50 feet long making the Fifth Street front 80 feet. The entire building will be two stories high with Mansard roof practically making it equal to three stories In addition to usual offices, dining hall and parlors, the hotel will have at least forty chambers and suites.

Carman Carvings.

Carman Courier.

Mr. J. L. Bailey has rented his farm at Kittson, and will remove to this place in a few days.

Mr. E Kof, of Hammond, Wis., has returned to Carman, to work for E. D. Childs & Co., his old place, this summer.

The new well just finished by Mr. E. D. Childs, on the river bank is a fine one, its flow is 50 barrels per day. They had considerable difficulty in procuring water, it being 196 feet deep.

Our citizens were very much alarmed yesterday at seeing D. A. Darby, superintendant of fire department rushing to a conflagration with the hook and ladder company, of this place under his supervision, the flames were delayed on Mr. Blanchards house without much loss. The shingles being somewhat demoralized.

A Destitute Stranger.

Minneapolis Journal: An old German and his family arrived at the Manitoba depot yesterday in destitute circumstances. According to the old gentleman's story a man recently appeared in Germany claiming that he was an agent at Crookston, Minnesota, and giving the family a glowing description of the country, promised immediate work at large pay if they would come over with him. The old man did not have money enough to pay the fare through to Crookston, but could secure passage as far as Minneapolis. This satisfied the "agent," who guaranteed to furnish transportation from this city. At Chicago the alleged agent disappeared, and the family arrived in Minneapolis destitute—not having a cent in the world. The kind-hearted officials at the depot cared for them and will procure work for the old gentleman in this city. What object the imposter could have in making the false assertions can not be imagined, unless it was to secure the commission offered by some steamship lines for each emigrant passenger induced to cross the ocean by their line.

The earth had healed her wounded breast;
The cannon plow the fields no more;
The heroes rest, O let them rest,
In peace along the peaceful shores.
They fought for peace, for peace they fell;
They sleep in peace and all is well.

The fields forget the battles fought,
The trenches wave in golden grain;
Shall we neglect the lesson taught
And tear the wound agape again?
Sweet Mother Nature, nurse the land,
And heal her wounds with gentle hand.

Lo! peace on earth! Lo! flock and fold,
Lo! rich abundance, fat increase,
And valleys clad in sheen of gold,
O rise and sing the song of peace!
For Theseus roams the land no more,
And Janus rests within the door!

A TEXAS RANGER.

The Story Told by an Old Scout—A Model Frontiersman.

Texas Letter to Philadelphia Times.

The next day we reached the camp of the antelope hunters at Wards Wells, which is a watering-place one hundred and fifty miles west of the Colorado river. We were hospitably received and "Mad Milton" introduced me. On the morrow they intended to start out on a hunt and we were glad to accompany them. They stalk the antelope on foot, and when one is killed it is disembowled and thrown into a light wagon which follows the hunters. When the wagon is loaded they drive to the nearest point on the railroad and ship the product of their rifles to the northern markets.

The chief of the hunting outfit was a man in middle life, six feet three or four inches tall, straight as an arrow and lithe and wiry as a panther. He had keen gray eyes, which were the most expressive feature of a rugged though kindly face. He was dressed in true frontier style and superbly armed. I admired a peculiar knife and pistol-scabbard which he wore and he informed me that it was made out of the skirts of the saddle of that famous desperado, Sam Bass. He was at first very diffident and spoke about himself with great modesty. After we became better acquainted he grew more communicative and around the camp-fire during that two weeks he spun many a yarn of frontier adventure, rivaling in dramatic interest the stories told by the dime-novel writers. This frontiersman's proper name is N. L. Jenkins, but like most border men, he has an alias, of which I shall have something to say further on. He was born in Tennessee, but when he was thirteen years old his parents moved West, settling first in Missouri, afterwards wandering to Kansas and from there to Colorado. Young Jenkins early learned the use of the rifle; he became an expert marksman and at the age of 16 killed his first Indian. He is a magnificent horseman and is rather proud of this accomplishment. Continued out door life on the plains and in the mountains developed his independence of spirit and for years he lived among the wilds of the then almost unknown West hunting and fishing. He had many adventures and countless hair-breadth escapes from death. Like most boarder men he cultivated an intense and bitter hatred for Lo, and many an Indian has been sent to the happy hunting grounds through his agency. I asked him how many Indians he had killed in his lifetime.

"Right smart," was the answer; "so many that I lost count of them years ago."

His fame as a brave and skilful border man gave him a reputation all along the frontier, and just after the close of the late war he was employed by Brigadier General McKenzie, the famous Indian fighter, as a scout and guide. The general became strongly attached to him, and the friendship continues to this day. He participated in many fights with the red men, and when McKenzie raided into Mexico Jenkins guided the troops as far as the Rio Grande. For his services on this occasion General McKenzie presented him with a fine horse, which he still rides. The noted desperado, Sam Bass, was at this time terrorizing Texas by a succession of bold and brilliant robberies. Jenkins determined to follow Bass and mounted on a mule he took up the trail. The Rangers were pressing Bass at this time and a party under command of Captain Peake, of the frontier battalion, overtook Jenkins. When the commander of the Rangers asked the scout where he was going he made a characteristic reply. "I'm following up Sam Bass," he said, "and in twenty-four hours, judging by the sign, I'll overhaul his outfit."

This reply so pleased Captain Peake that he enlisted Jenkins on the spot and he remained with the Rangers several years. He was with Peake's command when Sam Bass was attacked on Salt creek, Denton county, early in the spring of 1878. In the fight which followed Jenkins killed Bass' lieutenant, the notorious "Arkansas Johnson," and wears the latter's spurs as a memento of the struggle. He was a favorite scout of the lamented Custer, and was with him only a short time before that last bloody battle on the Little Big Horn.

Captain Jim Peake considered Jenkins one of his best scouts, and speaks of him in terms of the warmest praise. When Jenkins joined Peake's command he had been away from civilization for years, and the captain on one occasion having to pay a visit to the capital city of the Lone Star State took Jenkins along with him. When they reached Austin Jenkins, who was in the dress of a frontiersman and armed to the teeth, attracted a great deal of attention, and the boys followed him about in crowds. He thought this ovation complimentary to himself and invited the curious juveniles to the nearest confectionery, where he spent all his money treating them to candy, soda water and ice cream. When night came the captain took Jenkins to the Raymond House for supper. The dining room was crowded and the table was resplendent in its setting of glass and silver. Jenkins advanced to the table, drew his bowie knife, speared a biscuit and a piece of steak, and [illegible]

[illegible] was way back in the fifties and me and my pardner were scouting and buffalo hunting on the head waters of the Colorado. Indians were tolerable thick in them parts but we were in camp three or four days before they pestered us. One evening I started out to kill a deer. I walked up the banks of a little creek for a mile or two and finally started up a buck. I fired and the buck dropped dead. Walking up to where he lay, I whipped out my knife to bleed him. Just as I stooped I saw the feathered head of a Commanche not twenty feet away, and before I could raise my gun three more bobbed up. I dropped one of 'em and stepped behind a rock for shelter. Just as about twenty of them rushed upon me from the rear. I clubbed my gun, but before I could swing it around my head to strike I was knocked down and knew nothing more until I came to in their camp, which was on a bluff about three miles from where I killed the deer. My head pained me a good deal, but I had the consolation of believing it would soon be over, for I'd killed many Comanches and I didn't expect any mercy.

"They gave me some breakfast—a slice of the very deer I had killed—and then brought me out in the center of the encampment. I learned then, for the first time what my punishment was to be. Tied to a stake in front of the chief's lodge was a young buffalo-bull about two-thirds grown and as wild as a broncho pony. Two bucks roped the bull and tied him down. Then they bound me on his back. At a signal from their chief they cut the bull loose, and, urged on by the yells of the whole tribe he started off at a pace that made me catch my breath. He headed down the creek up which I was coming when surprised by the Comanches. I expected every minute would be my last. I shut my eyes, but opened them again with a start when I heard the crack of a rifle and my shaggy horse fell forward on his head, dead. The fall bruised me considerably, and I lay in such a position that I could not see around me. I had no idea what was coming next, but was mighty glad when a familiar voice called my name and my pardner cut the thongs that bound me. There was a squad of soldiers with him and they were searching for me when the bull rushed by them. The soldiers called me 'the Buffalo Bull,' and I was known by that name for years. It was finally corrupted into 'Buffalo Bill,' and men who don't know my real name recognize me by the nickname."

"I suppose you have heard," I said, "that another man claims that nom de guerre and has a national notoriety in consequence?"

"Yes, yes," he answered, "I have heard of him."

"Which has the prior right to the name?"

"Well," said Jenkins, after a moment's hesitation, "I understand that the other fellow was a buffalo hunter and was given the name when they were building the Union Pacific Railroad. I had the ride on the bull in fifty-seven, and the people on the frontier called me 'Buffalo Bill' long before I began to scout for McKenzie."

Jenkins left the rangers on the first of last September and has been antelope hunting ever since.

TAKING EXERCISE.

An Example for Public Men—How John Quincy Adams Did.

From the New York Tribune.

The subject of exercise by the Chief Magistrate makes timely the personal confession of John Quincy Adams on this subject. He was a swimmer. Two days after he entered his eightieth year he recorded: "I rose this morning with the dawn, and, drawn by an irresistible impulse, walked over the lower Tiber bridge to my old bathing spot on the margin of the Potomac" (probably behind the Naval Observatory Hill, at what is called Braddock's Rock). "And there, under the shelter of a high bluff yet remaining, I bathed and swam from five to ten minutes, came out, dressed myself and walked home. As I went down the hill to the edge of the water I found three young men, neither of whom I knew, already in the river, and heard one of them say: 'There is John Quincy Adams.' They had their clothes at one of my old standard rocks, but without noticing or disturbing them I found another rock a few rods higher toward the Potomac bridge, where I left my clothes. The tide was low and the time not convenient for entering the river, but I succeeded in obtaining the bath for which I panted. The time consumed was as in former days, about one hour and a half—half an hour going to the river, half an hour to bathe, swim and dress, and half an hour to return. The thermometer was at eighty-four." The next day but one he records: "Third bath and swim in the Potomac at 5 o'clock this morning, thermometer seventy-four, and a brisk breeze, so that when I came out I shivered while dressing at my old rock, but warmed in walking home, and suffered no after inconvenience." This indefatigable swimmer also used a horse-hair strap and mitten daily in body bathing for three years. One day he took a walk with the celebrated Dr. Parkham (the man murdered by Webster?) in Boston just after a fierce ablution, and fell in a paralytic stroke.

Brains vs. Muscle.

Many years ago a Pittsburg iron firm purchased a lot of condemned bomb-shells for old iron. The shells were not loaded, but in order to melt them it was necessary that they should be broken up. This was attempted with sledge hammers, but the laborers made but little progress, and it was finally given up as a bad job. One day a long, slim Yankee came along and said—

"I understand you have a job for a man here."

"Yes," was the reply, "we want that pile of bombs out there broken."

"How much will you pay?"

"We will give a flip apiece (six and one-fourth cents) if you will agree to break them all." The officers had become so accustomed to seeing failures that they made this large offer to draw the man on and see him go at the labor with a vim.

"I'll take the contract," he answered. The Yankee [illegible] The day was a cold one and the thermometer down to zero. The man immediately went to work, but disdained to take the large sledge hammer which was offered him. [illegible]

[illegible] Oakland [illegible] The residences are universally freshly painted with [illegible] blinds, bay windows curtained with lace [illegible] gardens in which [illegible] Also grows on the [illegible] either side of the [illegible] It is charming to drive up and down these wide, broadly margined streets, lined with unbroken rows of nice residences. No [illegible] no shop [illegible] row of tenement houses or [illegible] hovels. Some streets run from [illegible] an estuary of the bay, called Lake Merritt. These streets are avenues, with elegant, often palatial, residences, by extensive perfectly kept lawns and flowering shrubs. You think of Newport or some elegant suburb of Boston, when suddenly a Chinaman comes from the barn, and with the air of one at home, begins irrigating the lawn. Next a tall palm shows its unexpected head and your old friend the geranium grows into a high shrub, forms a hedge and proudly nods a welcome over the ordinary height of a fence. The tall shrub adorning and clambering above the bay window at the end of many a house is a fuchsia. In my garden are varieties of greenhouse roses at home, flourishing and just coming into bloom, while heliotrope in great masses grows here and there, bravely. If you turn from these fine avenues to more unpretentious streets, though not any narrower, you come upon rows of houses too small for man and too large for birds. I stopped and laughed at my first sight of them. They present one bay window and one door, no wider and only the height of the room; no roof but a flat surface on the top. They run back to give room for perhaps three or four rooms, and that is all. Now and then they have a basement under a flight of tiny steps. But after learning the price and importance of kitchen help, from the wearying perplexities of your own large house, you look afterwards with a feeling akin to regret at these miniature homes. You notice the spotless, nice lace curtains, the new paint, the trim garden, and imagine that one woman can keep it all clean with no help and no fatigue, the markets are roomy, high and neat. Meats are much lower than with us, if you are careful to go where no one will see a green purchaser in you. Nice porter house steak for 15 cents per pound, mutton from 7 to 10 cents, roast beef the same, fish comes about the same, or a trifle higher than in the east, except salmon. We had some nice sturgeon yesterday for about 12 1-2 cents per pound. The business stores are made of wood, and low on account of earthquakes. We had a slight shock Friday morning at 3, but we took no notice of it. There has been no heavy shock for ten years. These stores, with often a row of one-story ones, look to us not business like or solid enough for the size of the city. However inside the stores the room is ample, the arrangement and display of goods very like our own. The prices, too, nearly the same. Many goods are of the same price, so that you inquire how it is. They say that there is a united co-operation of business firms, who by unity and large importations from New York and Boston compel the freight companies to lower prices to two cents per pound. Those not belonging pay five or six cents per pound. Of the people whom I have met I can speak only to praise.

Good Health Makes Earth a Heaven.

Remember Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla has proven itself to be the best blood-purifier, health renewer, and truest strengthener that can be prepared from our present knowledge of drugs. It is a positive cure for scrofula and syphilitic disorders, weak kidneys, nervous debility, dyspepsia, etc. It is especially strengthening to the digestive and urinary organs and nervous system. Its soothing effect on mind and body is most wonderful. It acts like a charm in relieving all physical and mental distress. It quickly expels all blood impurities. It makes the old feel young and buoyant. It imparts health, strength and vigor to every part of the body.

A Brave Captain Who Said "Aw" and "Assuah."

"I got badly left in forming a hasty opinion of the lad-de-dah captain of an English ironclad," said Capt. Ormiston, of the British steamer Effective. "During the recent war in Egypt I took out supplies to Alexandria, and after discharging received orders to go to Berwickport for a charter. I knew nothing of the place, and finally concluded to apply to the captain to the iron-clad Invincible, that lay close alongside of us, as a last chance. I pulled up to the gang-way and made my way up to the bridge, where I found a little light-haired man trotting up and down. His hat was cocked roguishly on the side of his head; he wore long side-whiskers, and an eye-glass dangled from a gold chain about his neck. As I approached he halted suddenly, whirled about on one foot, screwed his eye-glass into his eye and, in a sweet little piping voice, said:

"'My deah fellah, what can aw do faw you?' He cut such a figure that I was tempted to laugh in his face, but, controlling myself, I stated my errand. Immediately the little man had all the quartermasters running to find his sub-officers, and in a jiffy they returned and, touching their caps, they began to report that Mr. A. was ashore on liberty, Mr. B. had gone to Cairo, and that Mr. C. was away in the first cutter—and so on. He then turned to me and rubbing his hands, said: 'My deah fellah, Berwickport is a very fine place, aw assuah you; you will find no trouble in getting in; aw was there once, meself.' Thinks I, what an ass this man is, and touching my hat I was about to go when a big, bluff, sailor-looking officer appeared and informed the captain that there was no chart of the British north coast aboard the ship. Thanking the captain for his trouble, I went over the side and pulled aboard my own ship.

"No doubt you would have agreed with me that the captain was no sailor and a fool beside, but you would have been mistaken and perplexed as I was [illegible]

[illegible] Tombstone in particular. "Do you see them hills?" asked the Tombstoner, pointing through one of the [illegible] window. "Well, them hills is chock full of pay dirt." The young man from the east looked shocked [illegible]

"My dear sir," he said, proudly, but kindly, "you should say those hills are—not them hills is."

The Tombstoner was silent for a moment. He looked the young man from the east critically over as if he was estimating the size of coffin he would wear. Then drawing out an ivory-stocked seven-shooter of elaborate style and finish, he said in a soft, mild, musical tone of voice that sounded like a wild-wood brook coursing o'er its pebble bed: "My gentle unsalted tenderfoot from the land of the rising sun, this here's a pint that you and me disagrees on and we might as well have it settled right now. I have not looked in a grammar lately, but I think 'them hills is' is correct, and I'm going to stand by that opinion while I've got a shot left. I'll give you jest three minutes to think calmly over the subject, for you probably spoke in haste the first time, and then I'll hear your decision."

The young man from the east looked down the delicately-chased barrel of the revolver, into the placid depths of the eye of the Tombstoner and began to feel that many points in grammar are uncertain and liable to grow more so. Then he thought of the coroner's inquest and of the verdict, "came to his death by standing in front of Colorado Tom's seven-shooter," and of the long pine box going east by express with $69 charges on it, and before half the three minutes was up he was ready to acknowledge his error. "Since he had thought it over calmly," he said, "he believed that 'them hills is' is right. He had spoken on the spur of the moment," he added, "and begged a thousand pardons for his presumptuous effort to substitute bad grammar for good."

The Tombstoner forgave him freely, and, grasping his hand, said:

"I know'd you'd say you was wrong after you thought a moment. I admire a man who gives right in without arguing when he know's he's wrong. Come along and irrigate." And they irrigated.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS

What the great restorative, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, will do, must be gathered from what it has done. Failing!

That is what a great many people are doing. They don't know just what is the matter, but they have a combination of pains and aches, and each month they grow worse.

The only sure remedy yet found is BROWN'S IRON BITTERS, and this by rapid and thorough assimilation with the blood purifies and enriches it, and rich, strong blood flowing to every part of the system repairs the wasted tissues, drives out disease and gives health and strength.

This is why BROWN'S IRON BITTERS will cure kidney and liver diseases, consumption, rheumatism, neuralgia, dyspepsia, malaria, intermittent fevers, &c.

203 S. Paca St., Baltimore,
Nov. 28, 1881.

I was a great sufferer from Dyspepsia, and for several weeks could eat nothing and was growing weaker every day. I tried Brown's Iron Bitters, and am happy to say I now have a good appetite, and am getting stronger.

THE PEOPLE'S SONG OF PEACE.

JOAQUIN MILLER.

The grass is green on Bunker Hill,
The waters sweet in Brandywine;
The sword sleeps in the scabbard still,
The farmer keeps his flock and vine;
Then who would mar the scene to-day
With vaunt of battlefield or fray.

The brave corn lifts, in regiments,
Ten thousand sabres in the sun;
The ricks replace the battle-tents,
The bannered tassels toss and run,
The neighboring steed, the bugle's blast—
These be the stories of the past.

The earth had healed her wounded breast,
The cannon plow the fields no more;
The heroes rest; O let them rest
In peace along the peaceful shores:
They fought for peace, for peace they fell;
They sleep in peace and all is well.

The fields forget the battles fought,
The trenches wave in golden grain;
Shall we neglect the lesson taught
And tear the wound agape again?
Sweet Mother Nature, nurse the land,
And heal her wounds with gentle hand.

Lo! peace on earth! Lo! flock and fold,
Lo! rich abundance, fat increase,
And valleys clad in sheen of gold,
O rise and sing the song of peace!
For Theseus roams the land no more,
And Janus rests within the door!

A TEXAS RANGER.

The Story Told by an Old Scout—A Model Frontiersman.

Texas Letter to Philadelphia Times.

The next day we reached the camp of the antelope hunters at Wards Wells, which is a watering-place one hundred and fifty miles west of the Colorado river. We were hospitably received and "Mad Milton" introduced me. On the morrow they intended to start out on a hunt and we were glad to accompany them. They stalk the antelope on foot, and when one is killed it is disembowled and thrown into a light wagon which follows the hunters. When the wagon is loaded they drive to the nearest point on the railroad and ship the product of their rifles to the northern markets.

The chief of the hunting outfit was a man in middle life, six feet three or four inches tall, straight as an arrow and lithe and wiry as a panther. He had keen gray eyes, which were the most expressive feature of a ragged though kindly face. He was dressed in true frontier style and superbly armed. I admired a peculiar knife and pistol-scabbard which he wore and he informed me that it was made out of the skirts of the saddle of that famous desperado, Sam Bass. He was at first very diffident and spoke about himself with great modesty. After we became better acquainted he grew more communicative and around the camp-fire during that two weeks he spun many a yarn of frontier adventure, rivaling in dramatic interest the stories told by the dime-novel writers. This frontiersman's proper name is N. L. Jenkins, but like most border men, he has an alias, of which I shall have something to say further on. He was born in Tennessee, but when he was thirteen years old his parents moved West, settling first in Missouri, afterwards wandering to Kansas and from there to Colorado. Young Jenkins early learned the use of the rifle; he became an expert marksman and at the age of 16 killed his first Indian. He is a magnificent horseman and is rather proud of this accomplishment. Continued out door life on the plains and in the mountains developed his independence of spirit and for years he lived among the wilds of the then almost unknown West hunting and fishing. He had many adventures and countless hair-breadth escapes from death. Like most boarder men he cultivated an intense and bitter hatred for Lo, and many an Indian has been sent to the happy hunting grounds through his agency. I asked him how many Indians he had killed in his lifetime.

"Right smart," was the answer; "so many that I lost count of them years ago."

His fame as a brave and skilful border man gave him a reputation all along the frontier, and just after the close of the late war he was employed by Brigadier General McKenzie, the famous Indian fighter, as a scout and guide. The general became strongly attached to him, and the friendship continues to this day. He participated in many fights with the red men, and when McKenzie raided into Mexico Jenkins guided the troops as far as the Rio Grande. For his services on this occasion General McKenzie presented him with a fine horse, which he still rides. The noted desperado, Sam Bass, was at this time terrorizing Texas by a succession of bold and brilliant robberies. Jenkins determined to follow Bass and mounted on a mule he took up the trail. The Rangers were pressing Bass at this time and a party under command of Captain Peake, of the frontier battalion, overtook Jenkins. When the commander of the Rangers asked the scout where he was going he made a characteristic reply. "I'm following up Sam Bass," he said, "and in twenty-four hours, judging by the sign, I'll overhaul his outfit."

This reply so pleased Captain Peake that he enlisted Jenkins on the spot and he remained with the Rangers several years. He was with Peake's command when Sam Bass was attacked on Salt creek, Denton county, early in the spring of 1878. In the fight which followed Jenkins killed Bass' lieutenant, the notorious "Arkansas Johnson," and wears the latter's spurs as a memento of the struggle. He was a favorite scout of the lamented Custer and was with him only a short time before that last bloody battle on the Little Big Horn.

Captain Jim Peake considered Jenkins one of his best scouts and speaks of him in terms of the warmest praise. When Jenkins joined Peake's command he had been away from civilization for years, and the captain on one occasion having to pay a visit to the capital city of the Lone Star State took Jenkins along with him. When they reached Austin Jenkins, who was in the dress of a frontiersman and armed to the teeth, attracted a great deal of attention, and the boys followed him about in crowds. He thought this ovation complimentary to himself and invited the curious juveniles to the nearest confectionery, where he spent all his money treating them to candy, soda water and ice cream. When night came the captain took Jenkins to the Raymond house for supper. The dining room was crowded and the table was resplendent in its setting of glass and silver. Jenkins advanced to the table, drew his bowie-knife, speared a biscuit and a piece of steak, and stepping back began to eat as he had been accustomed to eat in camp, standing up, with his bowie-knife and fingers answering all purposes. A grinning servant invited him to be seated.

"No, thankee," was the answer, "I'm doing tolerable well here."

He was assigned a room at the hotel furnished in the most luxurient manner, with soft carpets, rich furniture and a downy bed. When the captain went in to arouse him next morning Jenkins was stretched out on the floor, wrapped in his blanket.

"Why didn't you sleep in bed?" asked the captain.

"I did try the durned thing," was the answer, "but I bogged in it clear over my head."

My friend "Mad Milton" had addressed Jenkins as "Buffalo Bill," and one night I asked him how he came by the title:

"Well," said he, "it's a song story. It was way back in the fifties and me and my pardner were scouting and buffalo hunting on the head waters of the Colorado. Indians were tolerable thick in them parts but we were in camp three or four days before they pestered us. One evening I started out to kill a deer. I walked up the bank of a little creek for a mile or two and finally started up a buck. I fired and he dropped dead. Walking up to where he lay I whipped out my knife to bleed him. Just as I stooped I saw the feathered head of a Commanche not twenty feet away, and before I could raise my gun three more bobbed up. I dropped one of 'em and stepped behind a rock for shelter just as about twenty of them rushed upon me from the rear. I clubbed my gun, but before I could swing it around my head to strike I was knocked down and knew nothing more until I came to in their camp, which was on a bluff about three miles from where I killed the deer. My head pained me a good deal, but I had the consolation of believing it would soon be over, for I'd killed many Comanches and I didn't expect any mercy.

"They gave me some breakfast—a slice of the very deer I had killed—and then brought me out in the center of the encampment. I learned then, for the first time what my punishment was to be. Tied to a stake in front of the chief's lodge was a young buffalo-bull about two-thirds grown and as wild as a broncho pony. Two bucks roped the bull and tied him down. Then they bound me on his back. At a signal from their chief they cut the bull loose, and, urged on by the yells of the whole tribe he started off at a pace that made me catch my breath. He headed down the creek up which I was coming when surprised by the Comanches. I expected every minute would be my last. I shut my eyes, but opened them again with a start when I heard the crack of a rifle and my shaggy horse fell forward on his head, dead. The fall bruised me considerably, and I lay in such a position that I could not see around me. I had no idea what was coming next, but was mighty glad when a familiar voice called my name and my pardner cut the thongs that bound me. There was a squad of soldiers with him and they were searching for me when the bull rushed by them. The soldiers called me 'the Buffalo Bull,' and I was known by that name for years. It was finally corrupted into 'Buffalo Bill,' and men who don't know my real name recognize me by the nickname."

"I suppose you have heard," I said, "that another man claims that nom de guerre and has a national notoriety in consequence?"

"Yes, yes," he answered, "I have heard of him."

"Which has the prior right to the name?"

"Well," said Jenkins, after a moment's hesitation, "I understand that the other fellow was a buffalo hunter and was given the name when they were building the Union Pacific Railroad. I had the ride on the bull in fifty-seven, and the people on the frontier called me 'Buffalo Bill' long before I began to scout for McKenzie."

Jenkins left the rangers on the first of last September and has been antelope hunting ever since.

TAKING EXERCISE.

An Example for Public Men—How John Quincy Adams Did.

From the New York Tribune.

The subject of exercise by the Chief Magistrate makes timely the personal confession of John Quincy Adams on this subject. He was a swimmer. Two days after he entered his eightieth year he recorded: "I rose this morning with the dawn, and, drawn by an irresistible impulse, walked over the lower Tiber bridge to my old bathing spot on the margin of the Potomac" (probably behind the Naval Observatory Hill at what is called Braddock's Rock). "And there, under the shelter of a high bluff yet remaining, I bathed and swam from five to ten minutes, came out, dressed myself and walked home. As I went down the hill to the edge of the water I found three young men, (neither of whom I knew, already in the river, and heard one of them say: 'There is John Quincy Adams.' They had their clothes at one of my old standard rocks, but without noticing or disturbing them I found another rock a few rods higher toward the Potomac bridge where I left my clothes. The tide was low and the time not convenient for entering the river, but I succeeded in obtaining the bath for which I panted. The time consumed was as in former days, about one hour and a half—half an hour going to the river, half an hour to bathe, swim and dress, and half an hour to return. The thermometer was at eighty-four." The next day but one he records: "Third bath and swim in the Potomac at 5 o'clock this morning, thremometer seventy-four, and a brisk breeze, so that when I came out I shivered while dressing at my old rock, but warmed in walking home, and suffered no after inconvenience." This indefatigable swimmer also used a horse-hair strap and mitten daily in body bathing for three years. One day he took a walk with the celebrated Dr. Parkham (the man murdered by Webster?) in Boston just after a fierce ablution, and fell in a paralytic stroke.

Brains vs. Muscle.

Many years ago a Pittsburg irom firm purchased a lot of condemned bomb-shells for old iron. The shells were not loaded, but in order to melt them it was necessary that they should be broken up. This was attempted with sledge hammers, but the labores made but little progress, and it was finally given up as a bad job. One day a long, slim Yankee came along and said—

"I understand you have a job for a man here."

"Yes," was the reply; "we want that pile of bombs out there broken."

"How much will you pay?"

"We will give a fip apiece (six and one-fourth cents) if you will agree to break them all." The officers had become so accustomed to seeing failures that they made this large offer to draw the man on and see him go at the labor with a vim.

"I'll take the contract," answered the Yankee. The day was a cold one, and the thermometer down to zero. The man immediately went to work, but disdained to take the large sledge hammer which was offered him. He went out on the ground, and every one who had heard of the new man gathered at the windows to notice his mode of operations, and have as they thought, their usual laugh. The Yankee laid every bomb out on the ground with the hole up. He procured a bucket, filled them all with water; then he came into the house, made out his bill, and said he would call around in the morning for the money. Every one was much mystified, but in the morning their astonishment was great. The water had frozen during the night, and in the morning a pile of scrap iron was found, as the freezing water had broken every bomb into at least a dozen pieces.

Mr. William West, the younger brother of the British Minister at Washington, has just died in London.

A California City.

A Massachusetts correspondent, writing from Oakland, Cal., the last of October, gives the following description of the place:

"Oakland is a city of residences," as the geography describes it, and that is accurate. The residences are universally freshly painted, with inside blinds, bay windows, curtained with lace; trim gardens in which flourishes as much lawn grass as you see at home. The grass also grows on the broad sidewalks, on either side of the central plank walk. It is charming to drive up and down these wide, broadly-margined streets, lined with unbroken rows of nice residences. No factory, no shoe shop, no unsightly row of tenement houses or slatternly hovels. Some streets run from an estuary of the bay, called Lake Merritt. These streets are avenues, with elegant, often palatial residences, by extensive, perfectly kept lawns and flowering shrubs. You think of Newport or some elegant suburb of Boston, when suddenly a Chinaman comes from the barn, and, with the air of one at home, begins irrigating the lawn. Next a tall palm shows its unexpected head, and your old friend, the geranium, grows into a high shrub, forms a hedge and proudly nods a welcome over the ordinary height of a fence. The tall shrub adorning and clambering above the bay window at the end of many a house is a fuschia. In my garden are varieties of greenhouse roses at home, flourishing and just coming into bloom, while heliotrope in great masses grows here and there bravely. If you turn from these fine avenues to more unpretentious streets, though not any narrower, you come upon rows of houses too small for man and too large for birds. I stopped and laughed at my first sight of them. They present one bay window and one door, no wider and only the height of the room, no roof but a flat surface on the top. They run back to give room for perhaps three or four rooms, and that is all. Now and then they have a basement under a flight of tiny steps. But after learning the price and importance of kitchen help, from the wearying perplexities of your own large house, you look afterwards with a feeling akin to regret at these miniature homes. You notice the spotten, nice lace curtains, the new paint, the trim garden, and imagine that one woman can keep it all clean with no help and no fatigue, the markets are roomy, high and neat. Meats are much lower than with us, if you are careful to go where no one will see a green purchaser in you. Nice porter house steak for 15 cents per pound, mutton from 7 to 10 cents, roast beef the same; fish comes about the same, or a trifle higher than in the east, except salmon. We had some nice sturgeon yesterday for about 12 1-2 cents per pound. The business stores are made of wood, and low on account of earthquakes. We had a slight shock Friday morning at 3, but we took no notice of it. There has been no heavy shock for ten years. These stores, with often a row of one-story ones, look to us not business like or solid enough for the size of the city. However inside the stores the room is ample, the arrangement and display of goods very like our own. The prices, too, nearly the same. Many goods are of the same price, so that you inquire how it is. They say that there is a united co-operation of business firms, who by unity and large importations from New York and Boston compel the freight companies to lower prices to two cents per pound. Those not belonging pay five or six cents per pound. Of the people whom I have met I can speak only to praise.

Good Health Makes Earth a Heaven.

Remember Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla has proven itself to be the best blood purifier, health renewer, and truest strengthener that can be prepared from our present knowledge of drugs. It is a positive cure for scrofula and syphilitic disorders, weak kidneys, nervous debility, dyspepsia, etc. It is especially strengthening to the digestive and urinary organs and nervous system. Its soothing effect on mind and body is most wonderful. It acts like a charm in relieving all physical and mental distress. It quickly expels all blood impurities. It makes the old feel young and buoyant. It imparts health, strength and vigor to every part of the body.

A Brave Captain Who Said "Aw" and "Assuah."

"I got badly left in forming a hasty opinion of the lad-de-dah captain of an English ironclad," said Capt. Ormiston, of the British steamer Effective. "During the recent war in Egypt I took out supplies to Alexandria, and after discharging received orders to go to Berwickport for a charter. I knew nothing of the place, and finally concluded to apply to the captain to the iron-clad Invincible, that lay close alongside of us, as a last chance. I pulled up to the gangway and made my way up to the bridge, where I found a little light-haired man trotting up and down. His hat was cocked rougishly on the side of his head; he wore long side-whiskers, and an eye-glass dangled from a gold chain about his neck. As I approached he halted suddenly, whirled about on one foot, screwed his eye-glass into his eye and, in a sweet little piping voice, said:

"My deah fellah, what can aw do faw you?" He cut such a figure that I was tempted to laugh in his face, but, controlling myself, I stated my errand. Immediately the little man had all the quartermasters running to find his sub-officers, and in a jiffy they returned and, touching their caps, they began to report that Mr. A. was ashore on liberty, Mr. B. had gone to Cairo, and that Mr. C. was away in the first cutter—and so on. He then turned to me and rubbing his hands, said: "My deah fellah, Berwickport is a very fine place, aw assuah you; you will find no trouble in geting in; aw was there once meself." Thinks I, what an ass this man is, and touching my hat I was about to go, when a big, bluff, sailor-looking officer appeared and informed the captain that there was no chart of the British north coast aboard the ship. Thanking the captain for his trouble, I went over the side and pulled aboard my own ship.

"No doubt you would have agreed with me that the captain was no sailor and a fool beside, but you would have been mistaken and perplexed as I was. The next night the Invincible went out to sea, with a man in the chains heaving the lead. Of a sudden the breast-strap parted and away went the man overboard. The same little captain was on the bridge. Instantly the foppish airs were gone and the true sailor appeared. Pulling the bells he stopped the vessel and just as he stood, oilskins and all on, went over board to rescue his man. One of his lieutenants and quartermaster jumped overboard to assist their commander. Instantly all was in an uproar. All hands were on deck. All the boats were lowered and the four men in a few minutes were safe on board the Invincible. The leadsman was entangled in the line and would certainly have drowned but for the prompt assistance of the captain. In addition, this was the fourth man that same officer had rescued from drowning. His crew swore by him. He was a peer of the realm, and a better officer does not walk the deck of an English ship to-day. No gentlemen, you can't always tell the man by the cut of his jib."—Philadelphia Times.

A Tenderfoot at Tombstone.

From the Middletown Transcript.

A few days ago a flash young man from an eastern college arrived at Tombstone, Arizona, and registered his name at the principal hotel. A sociably inclined person in a blue shirt and wide-rimmed hat, who chanced to be in the office, good-naturedly answered every question and volunteered a vast amount of interesting information about Arizona in general and Tombstone in particular.

"Do you see them hills?" asked the Tombstoner, pointing through one of the office windows. "Well, them hills is chock full of pay dirt."

The young man from the east looked shocked.

"My dear sir," he said, proudly, but kindly, "you should say those hills are—not, 'them hills is!'"

The Tombstoner was silent for a moment. He looked the young man from the east critically over as if he was estimating the size of coffin he would wear. Then drawing out an ivory-stocked seven shooter of elaborate style and finish, he said in a soft, mild, musical tone of voice that sounded like a wild-wood brook coursing o'er its pebble bed: "My gentle unsalted tenderfoot from the land of the rising sun, this here's a pint that you and me disagrees on and we might as well have it settled right now. I have not looked in a grammer lately, but I think 'them hills is' is correct, and I'm going to stand by that opinion while I've got a shot left. I'll give you jest three minutes to think calmly over the subject, for you probably spoke in haste the first time, and then I'll hear your decision."

The young man from the east looked down the delicately-chased barrel of the revolver into the placid depths of the eye of the Tombstoner and began to feel that many points in grammar are uncertain and liable to grow more so. Then he thought of the coroner's inquest and of the verdict, "came to his death by standing in front of Colorado Tom's seven-shooter," and of the long pine box going east by express with $69 charges on it, and before half the three minutes was up he was ready to acknowledge his error. "Since he had thought it over calmly," he said, "he believed that 'them hills is,' is right. He had spoken on the spur of the moment," he added, "and begged a thousand pardons for his presumptuous effort to substitute bad grammar for good."

The Tombstoner forgave him freely, and, grasping his hand, said:

"I know'd you'd say you was wrong after you thought a moment. I admire a man who gives right in without arguing when he know's he's wrong. Come along and irrigate." And they irrigated.

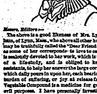
A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

[From the Boston Globe.]



Messrs. Editors:—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will cure entirely the worst form of falling of the uterus, Leucorrhœa, irregular and painful Menstruation, all Ovarian Troubles, Inflammation and Ulceration, Floodings, all Displacements and the consequent spinal weakness, and is especially adapted to the Change of Life."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1. per bottle or six for $5., and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

For Kidney Complaint of either sex this compound is unsurpassed as abundant testimonials show.

"Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity.

All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others.

Failing!

That is what a great many people are doing. They don't know just what is the matter, but they have a combination of pains and aches, and each month they grow worse.

The only sure remedy yet found is BROWN'S IRON BITTERS, and this by rapid and thorough assimilation with the blood purifies and enriches it, and rich, strong blood flowing to every part of the system repairs the wasted tissues, drives out disease and gives health and strength.

This is why BROWN'S IRON BITTERS will cure kidney and liver diseases, consumption, rheumatism, neuralgia, dyspepsia, malaria, intermittent fevers, &c.

203 S. Paca St., Baltimore.
Nov. 28, 1881.

I was a great sufferer from Dyspepsia, and for several weeks could eat nothing and was growing weaker every day. I tried Brown's Iron Bitters, and am happy to say I now have a good appetite, and am getting stronger.

THE
PACIFIC NORTHWEST!
Oregon, Washington & Idaho.

Offers the best field for Emigrants—viz.: a mild, equitable, and healthy climate; cheap lands of great fertility, producing all varieties of Grain, Fruit, and Grasses, in wonderful abundance; an inexhaustible supply of Timber; vast Coal Fields, and other mineral deposits; cheap and quick transportation by railroads and river navigation; direct commerce with all parts of the world, owing to its proximity to the Pacific Ocean.

NO DROUTHS, NO INSECT PESTS, NO HURRICANES, WHIRLWINDS, or OTHER DESTRUCTIVE PHENOMENA.

The Lands of the Pacific Northwest show an average yield of wheat per acre largely in excess of that of any other section of the United States.

No failure of crops has ever occurred.

Oregon Wheat commands a higher price than that of any other country in the Liverpool market.

An immense area of very fertile Railroad and Government Lands, within easy reach of the trunk lines of the Northern Pacific R. R., the Oregon Railway & Navigation, and the Oregon & California R. R. Co.'s and their numerous branches in the great Valleys of the Columbia and its tributaries, are now offered for sale at Low Prices, and on Easy Terms, or open to pre-emption and Homestead Entry.

The great movement of population to the Columbia region now in progress will be enormously increased by the completion of the Northern Pacific R. R. and the Oregon Railway & Navigation Co.'s systems. This renders certain a rapid increase in the value of Lands now open to purchase or to entry under the United States Land Laws.

MARCH.

A sodden gray in the chilly dawn,
A burst of the red gold sun at noon;
A windy lea for the dying day,
And a wail at dusk like the distant loon;
A ghost at night in the leafless larch;
A sigh and a moan,
And this is March.

A frown in the morning black and dim;
A smile when the day is half way run;
A moan when the wind comes up from the sea,
And tosses the larch when the day is done.
A penitent, changeful, gruesome thing,
Is this fierce love child
Of winter and spring.

It is mad with the rage of an unloved one,
It is chill with the winters that long have set;
It is sad at times and anon it laughs,
And is warm with the summers that is not yet.
And its voice laughs loud in the leafless larch;
But to sigh again,
And this is March.

A dose of quinine when the sun comes up
From its tossed up bed in the eastern sea;
Some castor oil when the moon has sped,
A blue pill dark and catnip tea,
A decoction made from the leafless larch,
And another blue pill,
And this is March.

BUDELL'S PROPOSAL.

This time two years ago our Square club was flourishing; now I am sole member. Budell, Marby, Smithers and myself had formed ourselves into a private bachelors' club for the purposes of whist and other intellectual occupations, and a very good time we contrived to have together. We hadn't many rules and by-laws for our club. We were sworn bachelors, and each of us had to allege a reason why he did not intend to wed; but we had so far recognized the possibility of a change in our sentiments as to solemnly bind ourselves to inform the club at once if we should ever meditate "halving our pleasures and doubling our expenses." Smithers hadn't time to marry; I was too poor, and Marby, who was regarded as our romantic member, gave us indefinitely to understand that "blighted affections" stood between him and the hymeneal altar. Budell at first laughed at the idea of assigning a reason; and he wished to allege as his that he hadn't met Mrs. Budell yet. That was unanimously rejected by the rest of the club; whereupon he insisted upon our accepting as an alternative that he was afraid of ladies. We were willing to stretch a point in favor of Budell, who was one of the jolliest possible fellows at a bachelor supper, and so we received this second reason. For the rest we nobly resolved not to fly, but to withstand temptation; our maxim was that every lady is charming so long as one is not married to her; and we were all ready to go into society, and even sustain the reputation of being "dancing men." We used to relate to each other over our celibate pipes wonderful stories of narrow escapes from guileful women every season; but, if these were all as dependent upon the narrator's fancy for their important details as my contributions to the conversation, the escapes were somewhat more than hair'sbreadth. Budell was especially a favorite in society; he was one of those rare phenomena, young barristers with some practice, and he had, beside, a very comfortable allowance from his father. Like the rest of the club, I had at first taken as a joke his assertion that he was afraid of ladies; but I gradually came to see that there was some truth in it. So long as Budell was in a large company—in a ball room or any place like that—he was quite at his ease and as bold as a lion; but if by any chance he happened to fall a temporary captive to a solitary damsel's bow and spear, he was almost overwhelmed with nervousness, and his usual powers of conversation completely deserted him. I once met him at the Royal academy, escorting a very pretty young lady, and looking as if he had a worse conscience than King Herod; and I have seen him tremble at a mere passing mention of the conservatory of his partner at a dance. However, in the Square club he was our most enthusiastic member; and horror and indignation filled our souls when we realized the direful fact that Budell was in love and doing his best to be married.

Had we been women we might probably have seen the symptoms of the advancing malady; but we were only obtuse and short-sighted men. Now, as I look back over these months, I recall incidents that might have been warnings. The gradual decrease of Budell's hilarity at the club, and the gradual increase of his excursions into society could hardly, indeed, have been portentous, for Budell always did go more into society that the rest of us. The first allusion he made to me about the lady who was afterward to play Beatrice to his Benedick was at a concert—or rather in the cloak-room after the concert. "That's what I call a pretty girl," he whispered to me; "that dark-eyed girl over there in the warm, fleecy-brown shawl—none of your flimsy white opera-cloaks." The girl was pretty, in a fresh, piquant sort of way; and even a sworn bachelor might have been excused for being pleased at receiving such a frank smile as she greeted Budell with. Again, not many days after he remarked to me apropos des bottes—"Met rather an interesting girl last night—quite agrees with me on the subject of names." I may be excused for neglecting this hint; Budell, I think, would have found a mollusk "interesting" if it had only agreed with him that there was nothing more objectionable than to have one's name murdered. He was nervously anxious that his name should be pronounced with the accent on the second syllable; and I afterward found that he had been introduced (for the second time) to this "interesting girl" as "Boodle." "Just as though I rhymed to noodle"—as he indignantly expressed it. But the most important hint was given the night after Mrs. Burton's ball, at which we had all been present. We were lounging in Budell's rooms, and Smithers was giving us a highly colored and graphic illustration of the frivolity that passes for conversation between young men and maidens. "That's all nonsense," broke in Budell; "it's your own fault at any rate. Why, last night I had quite a serious and interesting conversation about woman's education with a 'maiden.' I even quoted Scripture to her."

"Bet you a hat you misquoted," said the irreverent Smithers, who thought every one was as ignorant as himself.

"No; I'm not joking; it's a fact, and I got an idea or two, let me tell you." Had he only told us that he had ventured into the conservatory in order to carry on his conversation without interruption, I am convinced that I at least should have surmised that the acquisition of an idea or two was not the only result. However, I was not long in my state of ignorance. One day, a month or so after, Budell hunted me up to confide to me that the Bachelors' club was all bosh; he was over head and ears in love, and did I think he ought to tell the other men? Then there followed a shower of apologetics, in which "soft brown eyes" and goodness knows what other personal attractions were prominent. When I recovered breath I assured him that I thought it quite incumbent upon him to inform the club. I was rigid and cold with him, for I felt indignant; it was almost an insult to select me as his confidant, as though my celibate principles were less fixed than Marby's or Smithers'.

His announcement that evening was received in solemn silence by the Square club; even Smithers had at first nothing to say. At last Marby asked: "Is it permitted to inquire the lady's name, and when the marriage is to take place?" Budell looked uncomfortable. "Well, the fact is," he said, "I thought I ought to tell the club at once; but I haven't—that is, I don't quite know how to set about asking the lady."

Budell looked so comically distressed as he made this confession that the club hailed it with a shout of laughter. The notion of the bold and confident Budell finding himself muzzled by the tender passion was too suggestive for our risibility. Budell was seriously annoyed. "I don't think," he said, "that my courtesy to the club has been met with courtesy." He glared at me as if I specially has been guilty of revealing his confidence. We apologized humbly, and at last pacified him. He really was puzzled as to how to accomplish his proposal. Marby suggested the old-fashioned plan of plumping down on his knees like a swain in a valentine; but Budell paled visibly. It was such a cold-blooded way, he objected; yet it appeared he had almost adopted it on two occasions. The first time a little brute of a brother had inopportunely appeared—"I never knew of a nice girl that hadn't a little brute of a brother," exclaimed Budell, hastily generalizing; and on the second occasion he had even got the length of informing the object of his affections (to adopt a phrase that used to madden Budell) that he had something to tell her, when her mother entered, and he had hastily to devise some idiotic fact about a flower show. It was quite evident that his nerve was not equal to a third attempt. I suggested that he should write; but it seemed that the young lady, in talking about a certain novel, had laughed the hero to scorn for resorting to so cowardly a plan as writing his proposal.

"Can't you save her life in some thrilling manner, and then cast yourself at her feet?" asked the romantic Marby.

"Or can't you get overtaken in a shower, and then you could neatly ask her to share your lot as well as your umbrella?" suggested Smithers.

Budell smiled faintly. "It's all very well for you fellows to make fun of it when you haven't to do it yourselves; but, all the same, it's a ticklish thing to do well. I wish to do it in a neat and direct manner without any humbug."

"It's my opinion," said Smithers, "that you'll end by 'popping the question' in some altogether extraordinary and absurd manner."

"Very well, sir," said Budell, with dignity, "we shall see."

But when we left him, the idea of the irrepressible Budell being tongue-tied before a dainty little damsel, who couldn't even sit on a jury, came upon us again with redoubled force, and we awoke the echoes of the silent street with renewed shouts of laughter.

Poor Budell could find no opportunity of settling his fate. He revolved drearily round my rooms, where he materially interfered with my work by constantly putting skillfully elaborated questions to me, devised to extract my opinion as to his lady love, without revealing her name. I rose and fell in his estimation as my answers were what he desired or not; and I committed myself to an immense number of definite opinions as to the preference between blondes and brunettes, large mouths and small ears, etc., etc. "Whether do you prefer Greek or Saxon names for ladies?" he once asked me. I answered at random that I liked them both equally. "No, but really," he persisted, "I mean modern names derived from those languages." "Well," I replied at a venture, "I like Saxon names." "Do you?" he exclaimed; "why, so do I. For example, I don't think you could find a prettier name than Edith anywhere." "Oho!" I cried, "her name is Edith, is it?" Budell blushed, but couldn't deny it; and I daresay he would have revealed her surname also had I pressed him.

August brought me an invitation from Will Carlyon to spend a fortnight at his father's place in Scotland, and have a shot at the grouse. "I've asked Marby Smithers and Budell," he wrote, "and I expect them all. I know you four have frightful chains-and-slavery notions about matrimony; but there are lots of nice girls staying here with Fanny, and if you don't all go home with the full intention of forthwith becoming Benedicks I shall be surprised. Anyhow, we have plenty of birds."

When I arrived I found the house full of pleasant men and agreeable girls; while the grouse gave very fair sport. The club was there in full force. Budell was in tolerable spirits, and came out in grand style as master of ceremonies. He was too busy to inflict any more confidences, but I had no reason to suppose that he had yet accomplished his proposal.

One afternoon a heavy rain storm had driven the sportsmen in sooner than usual; I was examining my breech-loader in the gun-room when Smithers mysteriously requested me to come to the smoking-room at once. There I found Budell and Marby. Smithers had convened the club, and we had the room to ourselves. He briefly explained his object. "I have an announcement to make," he said, "similar to one made by Budell not long since. I'm going to follow his example, and I hereby invite you all to the wedding. Like Budell, I haven't yet put the final question, but I am not afraid of the answer. I have no objection to tell you that the young lady is at present in this house, and that her name is Miss Maxwell."

"Good heavens!" ejaculated Budell.

"Well," said Marby, "I may as well take this opportunity of informing the club that I too am going to follow suit. Only I've taken the precaution to speak to the young lady first, and Fanny Carlyon is shortly going to become Mrs. Marby."

I was thunderstruck. "In that case," I said with dignity, as I strode from the room, "I am now the only member of the Square club."

Just as I was tying my necktie a few minutes before dinner, and reflecting that, though nervousness, want of leisure and even blighted affections might be got over, I at least had a reason that would preserve me from matrimony, Budell hurried into my room.

"Look here," said he, "I'm in a deuce of a box! Smithers is going to propose to Miss Maxwell; and, hang it, that's Edith!"

"What! you're both in love with Miss Maxwell?"

"Yes, and that forward beast, Smithers, will be sure to propose right off; and I've never had a good opportunity."

"My dear Budell, you must make your opportunity. Do it to night."

"To-night? Why, it's dinner time already; and after dinner we're to have those blessed tableaux vivants; and goodness knows what Smithers will do while I'm looking after the wretched affairs. And then, to-morrow, I've promised Carlyon to start for the east moor at 9 o'clock."

I endeavored to comfort him by suggesting that possibly Miss Maxwell might refuse Smithers; but Budell shuddered at the possibility of being forestalled. He was palpably upset, and he looked nervous and anxious at dinner-time. The company generally attributed it to theatrical responsibility, but they were wrong; Budell was too old a hand to be anxious about anything so simple as tableaux vivants. Smithers, on the other hand, had secured a seat beside Miss Maxwell, and seemed to be making himself very agreeable.

The tableaux began immediately after dinner, and they were a great success. Budell had skillfully arranged them, without attempting to make them into a series; and music, supposed to be appropriate, or to have reference to each tableau, was played while the curtain was up. Curiously enough, in the second last tableau, Miss Maxwell, Smithers and Budell were to appear by themselves; and still more curiously, the subject of it was The Rivals. Where Budell had got it I don't know; probably in his inner consciousness. It was supposed to be a woodland scene in the paint-and-powder days. A young lady was discovered seated on a bank, with a lover kneeling at her feet, and holding one of her hands. At a little distance, and unseen by either of the lovers, was a rival glaring from among the trees at the unsuspecting pair. The tableau was very effective. Miss Maxwell look very charming in her costume, and Smithers glared splendidly. Budell's face it was impossible to see, for his back was turned to the audience. Up till now the performers had all managed to remain as rigid as statues, but in this tableau Miss Maxwell, who had already appeared several times, seemed to lose her nerve. The curtain had not been up a minute when she started, looked down at Budell, and at last, flushing crimson, fairly ran off the stage. However, the last tableau went off without a hitch, and the slight mistake did not affect the general verdict. An adjournment was made to have a dance in the hall, and I was standing idly looking on when Budell, once more in his usual garb, rushed up to me in a fever of excitement.

"By George, sir," he whispered, "congratulate me! I've done it; it's all right."

And he dragged me along with him from the hall into the empty library.

"What on earth do you mean, man?" I exclaimed. "What have you done?"

"I've proposed, sir; and I've been accepted."

I cordially congratulated him; and then I inquired, "How did you manage it—when did you find the time—and where the courage?"

"I'll tell you. I did it in that tableau. Under cover of the music I told Edith that in all sober earnestness I was at her feet, not in jest alone; and I asked her to be my wife. That's why she ran away."

'No wonder!' I interjected.

'Wasn't it splendid doing it under Smithers' very eyes? And then of course I saw Edith afterward in the little drawing-room; and she'll be here directly, whenever she has changed her costume.'

'Well, I'm glad you've settled it; and I think Smithers was right when he said you would end by proposing in some extraordinary way. And it seems to me that it was decidedly embarrassing for Miss Maxwell.'

Smithers married Edith Maxwell's sister eighteen months after the tableau.

A Sharp Youngster.

A San Francisco millionaire, hoping to encourage his promising son in ways of thrift, promised to give him 2 per cent. a month interest upon any money he might save out of his spending allowance and deposit in the paternal treasury. The young man was getting $20 a week for pocket money, and promised to show his appreciation of his father's affectionate offer. He began to make deposits without delay, and kept the practice up with remarkable regularity. The old gentleman noticed presently that the deposits exceeded the whole of the boy's allowance, but accounted for this by supposing that he had saved some money previously. Besides this, he received money frequently from his mother. So the fond parent rejoiced in the saving disposition his son was displaying. This continued until the boy's deposits assumed such dimensions as to demand an explanation. It then turned out that the most of the money he had been depositing had been borrowed. Inasmuch as he was drawing interest on his deposits at 2 per cent. a month, and was paying only 10 per cent. a year for them, he found the business decidedly attractive and profitable.

BALLADE OF LIGHT HOUSEKEEPING

'Tis subtly sweet suggestive phrase,
But the simple soul who is lured thereby,
Will make a sorrow for many days.
In secret oft will he moan and cry,
And vote the thing a tremendous lie,
For it means, this phrase that sounds so fair,
A world of trouble and toil and care;
And a wild, distracting wish to go
Away from it soon and anywhere.
I speak of the things whereof I know.

It means all little transparent ways
To hide away from the common eye
The fact that your bread and butter stays
In your desk; that you bake and boil and fry
In a single dish. It means to try
To hang your garments, the best you wear,
In a folding bed, that last despair
Of honest souls; and, bitterest blow,
It means a kitchen-parlor air.
I speak of the things whereof I know.

It means to shrink 'neath the stern amaze
Of the lordly butchers' and bakers' eye;
Apologizing in meek dispraise
For your modest wants. To rave or sigh
Over the fangs of the boughten pie.
'Tis to pray a strong, heaven-reaching prayer
For the meal a man pronounces "square".
And to be once more in life below
Free from that peace-destroying snare.
I speak of the things whereof I know.

ENVOY.

Ye who are tempted this life to share,
Pause ere ye enter the tiger's lair;
Consider the truth I fain would show;
For, with hand on heart, I firmly swear
I speak of the things whereof I know.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

Kitchen and Parlor.

There is danger, as many people have found to their sorrow, of gossamer waterproof cracking when stiffened by cold; so before putting it on, in severe weather, warm it before the fire, both outside and in, and this danger is averted.

A simple and easy way to ornament a common pillow-case for the baby's pillow is to feather-stitch it all around with scarlet marking-cotton. Choose the cotton which is warranted not to fade.

If you have plain boiled rice for dinner, and have a little left, it is by no means necessary that this should be thrown away; it will help to make delicious fritters; add milk and flour and one egg for the batter; if you have fruit to put in, so much the better; drop by spoonfuls in hot lard and fry till a delicate brown; a little sugar in the batter helps to give it a brown tinge.

There are many women, at least two in every village, some of whose moments are made burdensome on account of having in their sittingroom, behind the coal stove, a long shelf of wood. This is usually painted white, to match other wood-work in the room, and on this white painted surface, the soft, grey dust settles all the time. There is no vigilance short of the eternal which serves to keep it free. A young wife tried this plan, and it is so nearly satisfactory that she tells it for the benefit of others: Make a lambrequin for the shelf; it may be of aida canvas or of macreme. It need not be a deep lambrequin; from ten inches to fifteen will answer. Then cover the shelf with crash; and attach the lambrequin to it. The dust may settle there, but if given one careful brushing in the morning you will not be disheartened by seeing it for the rest of the day. The lambrequin in the case mentioned was made of macreme, and was crocheted; three spaces were left through which scarlet ribbons were run; the edge was finished with a deep, large scallop. The ribbons were put in lengthwise. If one chose to do so, the ribbons could be put in the other way and the ends could be left a little longer than the lambrequin, and, after being turned back in points, little tassels of crewel could be put on. This is a pretty design for a corner bracket.

It is a triumph worthy of any woman's thought and effort to see that her family is always supplied with bread, and yet that none is wasted. The power to do this is akin to some old-fashioned virtues, and there is a close relation between the habitual condition of the bread jar and the pecuniary health of the family. A crust saved is a crust earned, might be put in striking letters on the cover of the jar with good effect. "I believe in a hereafter, and I tremble," said a housekeeper one day, "when I think of the bread that has been thrown away from that jar!" This woman was one of those who have periodical awakenings, but who fail to give that cautious care and direct supervision to the small concerns of the house which alone result in a wise administration of its duties. The executive ability to successfully balance the needs of the bread jar may not be given to every woman, but she may at least see that none is wasted. If pieces have accumulated, dry them brown and crisp in the oven, and use them for stuffing for fowls, for the basis of a pudding, or for griddle cakes. If a half loaf or whole one is too stale to be relished on the table, set it in the steamer over a kettle of boiling water, and send to the table on a hot plate covered with a napkin; or, after pouring enough water over it to wet it, set it in a covered pan in the oven and let it remain there until the superfluous moisture has evaporated and the bread is really steaming. This should be an occasional dish only, for no one likes it many times in succession. Slices of stale bread may be dipped in egg and be fried brown in butter and be served as an omelet. There are many other ways in which it may be prepared, and, with a little care, no woman need reproach herself with the fear that through her neglect and wastefulness her children will come to "woeful want."

Decoration and Furniture.

A window may be so cosily and prettily treated, with low seats, a wide window-board or ledge for flowers and books, the whole being contained in an appropriate niche or recess, that it is painful to reflect on the vast number of opportunities for comfort and convenience which are lost in the too common method of dealing with the window opening merely as a hole in a brick or stone wall. It only remains for us to plead for uninterrupted access to the windows. We naturally are averse to placing tables or articles of furniture in front of them, and we must also deprecate the selection of this place for statuary. We so often find a marble group before the window—and this, remember, is about the worst place in the room for seeing it—that we feel compelled to speak strongly on this point. Sculpture, to be seen properly, requires to have the light in front of it, and to stand against a solid background—in nine cases out of ten it is ruin to a fine statue to place it against a window.

London Queen: There are circumstances that give to old furniture a distinct excellence, quite apart from the existence of a fashion for buying it. It was made by hand; generally the same man worked on each piece throughout, acquiring a special interest in every detail, and thinking no trouble too great to make it more perfect. It was sold oftenest in the immediate neighborhood, perhaps to a friend of the maker, and we may well believe that in this case special pains would be taken to produce the best possible value for the money. These old oaken chests were bought as a marriage portion, filled with the clothes of the bride, and they were handed down from mother to daughter, as good as when they were new. We have changed all that. Not only would daughters scout the idea of beginning housekeeping with their mothers' furniture, but they expect to purchase several new sets of furniture during their own lives. We do not even wish our furniture to last too long. It has almost as little individuality to the purchaser as the maker. Much of our modern furniture is cut by machinery. One makes legs and a second backs, while a third glues them together for a chair and passes it on to a fourth, who stuffs the seat. Often it passes through eight or ten pairs of hands before it is ready for sale. The result is a great many chairs, all about equally good, but none very good.

Folded away in trunks in the garret, or in seldom-visited closets, are many old-fashioned woolen shawls, which, if not corrupted by moths, may be made useful. No one thinks of wearing them; the green or yellowish-brown of those shawls could not be worn with comfort by one whose eye is accustomed to the lovely shades and tints so common now. If they can be used for any purpose it is better that they should not be laid aside forever. If double, cut the shawl in two parts; cut off the fringe and have one or both parts dyed. These soft old shawls make beautiful table-covers. They may be ornamented in any way to suit the fancy. If dyed dark brown a plain border of old gold velveteen is a handsome addition, or the spread may be hemmed and faced and have a border of velvet leaves put on in applique work, or a band of bright ribbon may be stitched on, or one of black velvet ribbon, with fancy stitches worked in gay silk, with some figure or a palm leaf or a group of palm leaves in the corners, or a fan half spread of velvet or silk, or a band of the handsome figured Canton flannel may be sewed on. The ways are innumerable in which the old shawl may be transformed into an article of use and beauty.

Facts Worth Knowing.

That salt fish are quickest and best freshened by soaking in sour milk.

That kerosene will make your teakettle as bright as new. Saturate a woolen rag and rub with it. It will also remove stains from the clean varnished furniture.

That cold rain water and soap will remove machine grease from washable fabrics.

That fish may be scaled much easier by first dipping them into boiling water for a minute.

That fresh meat, beginning to sour, will sweeten if placed out of doors in the cool air over night.

That milk which has changed may be sweetened or rendered fit for use again by stirring in a little soda.

That boiling starch is much improved by the addition of sperm or salt, or both, or a little gum arabic dissolved.

That a tablespoonful of turpentine boiled with your white clothes will greatly aid the whitening process.

That kerosene will soften boots and shoes that have been hardened by water, and will render them pliable as new.

That clear, boiling water will remove tea stains, and thus prevent its spreading over the fabric.

That salt will curdle new milk; hence, in preparing milk porridge, gravies, etc., the salt should not be added until the dish is prepared.

Household Hints.

A pretty way to cover a piano stool which is much worn is to cut a piece of broadcloth or felt so that it will fit the top. This may be left plain or may be ornamented with a vine in applique work. Around the edge of this sew a regular little lambrequin. Have the foundation of broadcloth or felt, or of velvet. This may be in one piece, cut in points or scallops, or in separate pieces, with the edges pinked or button-holed, and with a different design in applique or in Kensington embroidery on each part, or, if pressed for time, the lambrequin will be handsome if the design is the same on each part. Another way to make the lambrequin is to buy a strip of the fringed border intended for the edge of burlap mats, work the design woven in the border with bright-colored worsteds, and it is a pretty finish for the stool cover.

Old things are certainly become as new nowadays. Go to the garret and bring out one of the old low rocking chairs which were old-fashioned even in your mother's time, wipe off the dust, and cover the seat, the rounds, the back and rockers with some material within the possibilities of your purse. An old chair like this covered with cardinal plush costs $30 at an art furniture store, but may be covered at home at a far less cost. A good quality of velveteen makes a handsome covering; this may be fastened to the chair with gum arabic; it must be put on with great care and neatness. Cheaper material still will answer; the heavy Canton flannels wear well, and will brighten up an old chair wonderfully. No woman who has a few dollars now and then of her very own need despair, or have an unattractive home.

A delicious and inexpensive raisin cake is made of two eggs, one cup and a half of sugar, two-thirds of a cup of butter, one cup of sweet milk, two cups and a half of flour, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder or two teaspoonfuls of cream tartar, and one of soda; one cup of raisins, cloves, and cinnamon to suit your taste; one cup of stoned and chopped raisins. It is the experience of most cooks that cake made with cream of tartar and soda will keep moist longer than that made with baking powder, but the powder is so convenient to use that it has almost superseded the other. Do not frost this cake, but bake until the top is a dark brown.

Beside tidies and lambrequins for the mantel, and table spreads made of macreme or fish cord or carpet warp, very handsome window lambrequins are made also; and when one considers how short a time it takes to crochet them, it does not appear to be much of a task. One industrious woman, who never sits with idle hands, has made a bed spread also, with broad bands of ribbon run in it; it is a really elegant piece of fancy work, and one which will never wear out. The stand scarfs are pretty when crocheted of an open-work pattern, and lined with scarlet or blue silesia. The lining, of course, costs less than the ribbons.

A delicate omelete is made thus: Beat the yolks of four eggs, and while beating mix with them a teaspoonful of flour, two tablespoonfuls of pulverized sugar, a pinch of salt, and any flavoring extract you choose; this, of course, can be decided with reference to the other dishes which make up the dinner. Beat the whites of the four eggs to a froth and mix with the other. Bake this on a buttered dish; a deep plate will answer; it will rise very light and brown nicely in a very few minutes. Send to the table hot. If you please you may sift powdered sugar over it before sending it to the table.

Handsome mats for a table, on which nothing is to be placed unless it is a little easel or some article of this kind which will not conceal the mat, are made of one block of satin, with a figure embroidered or painted on it, have a small block at each corner of a different-colored satin or velvet, and slips at the side, thus making a border; put three tiny tassels at each corner, at a suitable distance apart. Line the mat so that it will lie smoothly in its place.

Steamed corn bread is particularly wholesome when made with buttermilk. If this cannot be procured, use loppered milk. To two cups of Indian meal allow one cup of white flour, two tablespoonfuls of white sugar, two and a half cups of milk, one teaspoonful of soda, one of salt, one tablespoonful and a half of melted butter; steam for two hours in a well-buttered tin, and dry off in the oven.

A delicious dish for dessert to be served with white and fruit cakes is made by taking one pint of thick, sweet cream, and beating it until it is very light; then add the grated rind of one large lemon and the juice of two; half a pound of pulverized sugar must then be stirred with the cream. Serve this in wine glasses, or in small china cups that will hold as much as the after-dinner coffee cups.

A good way to cover a straight-backed chair which is in use in the common sitting-room is to cut a piece of cretonne the exact size of the back; hem it with a narrow hem, and then with a sharp steel crochet needle put on a narrow border of worsted; pin this to the chair-back with long black-headed pins. This is a useful and pretty covering, and is easily removed and kept in place also.

The pudding which should invariably accompany a boiled dinner to the table is made in this way: One pint of sweet or sour milk, two teacups of corn meal, sifted; one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in hot water; add two slices of stale cake, crumbled very fine and mixed with the meal; boil for three hours in a bag; serve with a common sour pudding sauce.

Pretty easels to hold shells or pictures can be made by using for foundation the rulers or measures which are now distributed for advertising purposes. Split them and cover them with velvet. If you choose to tie the parts together with ribbon, you may do so, or simply sew them with strong silk or thread.

Russia's Political Novelist.

The New York Volkszeitung has information that Nicolai Spasskoff, a Russian refugee who arrived in Vienna recently, reports that Tschernyschewskij, the Russian author who has been for nineteen years an exile, has been insane since the beginning of the year. When Spasskoff saw him he was confined at Wilnjesk in the government of Irkutsk. He was raving mad. Tschernyschewskij was banished for writing the romance Schtodjelatj. The ceremony following upon his sentence is thus described by an eye witness:

"It was on May 20, 1864; a large crowd was hurrying to the Kassan Place, St Petersburg, where a scaffold was erected, guarded by soldiery. From far away I could see the pillory overtopping the scaffold and surrounding crowd. From the Kassan steeple the clock struck 9, and at the same time from a small alley a cart issued. It was painted black and accompanied by two gendarmes. The cart made its way through the crowd toward the scaffold. Two men descended, one of whom was an official, the other a civilian, who looked very pale. The officer beckoned the other to mount the scaffold. He obeyed and was received upon the scaffold by two men who were standing near the pillory. They wore red shirts and red caps and were helpers of the hangmen. One hung a black-board about the neck of the pale man, and in white letters these two words were painted upon it, "Gosudarstwennyj Prestupnik" ("State Criminal"). This was then the title of N. G. Tschernyschewskij, the beloved of Russia's youth.

"The officer took from his pocket a paper and read the sentence of the court, setting forth that the Honorable Counsellor Tschernyschewskij had been condemned to serve fourteen years at hard labor in the mines for issuing and circulating socialistic literature, and having served his term he would be banished for life to Siberia. Having finished reading, he commanded the prisoner to kneel down. Tschernyschewskij bent his knees, and then two thin swords were broken over his head, which was to signify that he was divested of his title, his honors and citizen's rights. At this moment a beautiful bouquet was thrown to him. A shower of bouquets and flowers followed. The officer made Tschernyschewskij stand up to the pillory that he might not pick up any of the flowers. From the scaffold he was hurried to Nerschinsk in Siberia, where he was compelled to dig in the mines under a continual torture of blows and of mental physical deprivations. After those seven years of agony he was sent from one prison to the other until they drove him crazy."

Arthur's Joke With the Players.

Washington Special: This city is becoming quite a center of athletic training. Its early spring attracted Hanlan from the ice-bound rivers of Canada, and now the Cleveland base ball team have come for a brief season of practice. The team visited the White House at noon to-day. The president was just about to convene a cabinet meeting. He postponed it a while to converse with the ball players. He complimented them by saying they were stalwart fellows. A quiet smile played on Arthur's lips as he got off this sly joke. He hoped they would have good luck this year; and in closing the interview remarked that good players were sure to be good citizens. Base ball men will swear by Arthur after this.

THE AWAKENING.

A spirit from the south through drifted glens
And o'er the naked woods and wilds has flown;
Slipped from their leashes in the mountain-dens
With deep and hollow voice the streams rush down,
Searching the level fields and sunken fens,
And round soft, sodden banks and hillocks bare
Whirling in turbid circles everywhere.

The spongy soil sinks weltering to the foot,
And still thin, dusky streaks of crusted snow
In cold shades linger on the hemlock's root;
But all the open lawns and meadows glow
With faint warm flame of many a tender shoot;
The hazel stems are bright with burnished green,
And russet-hooded buds spring up between.

The plains are full of mingled mist and light;
Cloud-shadows cross the hills with sudden showers;
The dawn in frosty calm breaks cold and white,
Ripening to golden bloom at noonday hours;
Shrill winds and winter flurries blur the night,
And in the glimpses of the rifted skies
The young moon's slender crescent gleams and dies.

FOR RELIGIOUS REFLECTION.

The Lack of Ministers.

The Springfield Republican accounts for the scarcity of ministers in many of the churches at the present day by saying that the divisions of Christianity have made it impossible to support a minister in many places. "The clergyman," it says, "is a meat-eating human being, generally a vertebrate; the Protestant clergyman is a man of family; he is not rich; no matter how sumptuously his education may have been conducted, it has not given him a bank account or a coupon cutter. It may have given expensive habits but it has not taught him to live on $500 a year and a 'donation party.' And to what are these starvation parishes due? Simply to the success, as its admirers deem it, of the hell-fire preaching of two generations ago, in splitting off the Methodist, Universalist and Unitarian churches from the orthodox establishment. What one of the preachers of the Congregational club neatly called 'the pungent preaching of forty years ago,' knived a good many of the old parishes and reduced them to that state in which they cannot support a minister. It was not only pungent, but it was suicidal, and the point was driven home."

Another reason which it gives is that in many instances "a young man full of the enthusiasm of the Gospel, ready to take hold and turn the rivers of sin all up-stream, is rather taken aback to find that his opportunity to grapple with his work may all depend upon his view of aion, hades, gehenna and a few passages in the Scriptures. No other profession offers such a stumbling block, stone instead of bread. The theological schools want less mystery of the future life and more effort to straighten out the sufficiently tangled web of this life."

Clergymen and Temperance.

The American Literary Churchman says: "There has been a series of admirable articles in the last three numbers of the Episcopal Register on the temperance question, which we heartily recommend to our readers. It is, in effect, a much-needed protest against the kind of 'bullying' to which the clergy are incessantly exposed by the more rabid teetotalers. To assume that a clergyman is indifferent to the shocking and destructive vice of intemperance is a gratuitous insult. To demand that he shall pledge himself to become a teetotaler is an insufferable impertinence. To say that the moderate use of stimulants is poisonous and the like, in face of the fact that they are used habitually by every civilized nation under heaven, is mere nonsense. But, anyhow, a clergyman is to judge for himself how best to counteract the habit of intemperance; and if teetotalism is to be made a condition of ordination or rectorship, it is only too certain that the supply of competent clergymen will be far more limited than it is even now. We can do God's work in the world without being in holy orders. The fact is that the people who 'pose' as 'weak believers' are among the strongest and most pugnacious of all known animals. It is precisely by its moderation and common sense that the Church Temperance society commends itself to intelligent men."

Religion in Colorado.

The Rev. Dr. Hayes, pastor of the Central Presbyterian church of Denver, Colo., in a recent lecture said that Christianity in Colorado is very unagressive. Never before in the religious world has there been seen so much self-complacency and content as is displayed by the church people of Colorado. The great disorganization which exists is taken advantage of by the skeptic and the atheist, and the result is that church people are in the background. When an office is to be filled the Methodist refuses it because he is afraid of exciting the jealousy or dislike of the Presbyterian; the latter cannot fill the position because he is afraid of exciting the displeasure of the Baptist and Methodist, and so on. And now comes the skeptic. He says: "Gentlemen, I am the man you are looking for; I believe in nothing, and I am the right man in the right place." His argument appears to be correct, and he is given the place, to the exclusion of a professing Christian, who could administer the affairs of the office with more purity of thought and action. The inactivity of Christians makes skepticism a good plea by which to accumulate financial wealth; therefore an increase in skeptics may be looked for, especially among the young.

Mixed Marriages.

The Catholic Review publishes a stout protest against "mixed marriages." The writer says: "Keep your children from and out of mixed marriages, lest in fifty years you need another St. Patrick or St. Boniface to convert a nation of pagans, made up of your grandchildren. Here is a lookingglass! Stand before it; watch it closely! Our town numbers 150 families entirely Catholic, and 450 'mixed families.' Of these latter, 400 have fallen away entirely and completely from the church; of the 50 outwardly professing the faith, only 20 earnestly strive to raise their children Catholics. Thus, 430 families are gone; count three children for each, and you have the round number of 1,290—including parents, 1,720 souls lost to the church—the work of less than twenty years. All my successors, within a hundred years, will not bring as many converts into the church as 430 careless parents, within so short a time, have sent out of the all-saving 'Bark of Peter.' Many of the parents in the mixed families referred to were themselves the results of mixed marriages, proving the everyday experience that the second generation of such unions will always be an entire loss to the church."

A Missionary Seminary.

The closing exercises of the academic year of the Rangoon Karen Theological seminary occurred Feb. 2. During the last year fifty young Karen men, from all parts of Burmah, have been in attendance. The course of study extends through four years, the first year being designed as a preparation for the purely theological studies of the next three years. The graduating class numbered five. The addresses of the young men were thoughtful and forcibly delivered. This school of the prophets has been an invaluable aid to the Karen mission. Its graduates are scattered as pastors and school teachers among the 450 Karen churches of Burmah, while several are foreign missionaries in regions under the rule of native princes, and far distant from British Burmah.

Droppings from the Sanctuary.

"Is thy cruse of comfort wasting? Rise and share it with another,
And through all the years of famine it shall serve thee and thy brother;
Love divine will fill thy storehouse, or thy handful still renew;
Scanty fare for one will often make a royal feast for two."

At the last meeting of the Congregational club of Boston, the Rev. Dr. Merriam said that Christianity, like everything else in the world, is a movement, and that, judged by the standards of the reformers, the modern orthodox theologians are very heretical. The Rev. Dr. Burrows believed in the nineteenth century's speaking its own mind, as the eighteenth had done. We cannot be shut up to quotations. Let the century speak anew in theology, he said, as in all other science and thus the roads may be made easier. Human constructions may be criticised; let the church go on with its restatements.

The Turkish authorities still refuse to permit the evangelical church at Vlanga (Constantinople) to erect a place of worship. This church has had in hand, during four years, funds, given by the board, for the construction of a meeting house. But jealousy on the part of Moslem fanatics has so far prevented their carrying out their plans. Meanwhile, the old chapel, where they have worshipped these thirty years, threatens to fall upon the heads of the congregations that throng it.

From Louisiana a missionary of the American Sunday School union reports a summary of ten months' work: 21 schools organized, with 82 teachers and 1,071 scholars; 22 schools visited and aided, having 81 teachers and 910 scholars; 238 families visited; 93 sermons and 41 addresses delivered. Every school supplied with scriptures and books.

Mr. Edward P. Thwing of Brooklyn is authority for the statement in the Church Union that in Saragossa, Spain, a girl, "though needing food—some of the other children at home had died for want of sustenance—had saved her centimos to get a copy of God's Word, a reference Bible, which she prized above the bread which perishes."

A fund for the erection of the much-needed church for the English congregation in Berlin was started by the chaplain on the occasion of the late silver wedding of the crown prince, and a considerable amount has already been subscribed for the object.

Two churches were organized in Pembina Presbytery on March 18, by Rev. John Irwin, presbyterial missionary, assisted by Rev. A. G. Forbes, viz.: Minto, with twenty-eight members, and Ardoch, with sixteen members, all in Dakota.

A revival now in progress at Carthage, Mo., has resulted in over 500 conversions. Religious meetings are being held throughout the city, and places of amusement are deserted.

The next English church congress will be held at Reading, near Oxford, in October. A temporary building, to hold 2,500 persons, will be erected for the purpose.

The chaplain of the Hampton institute says there has been a noteworthy revival among the students, more than eighty of whom have been recently converted.

The Presbyterian churches of New Orleans are all out of debt, the First church having paid off its indebtedness of $39,000 in two years.

The Presbyterian church of England has entered upon the work of raising £25,000 in the next five years as a fund for aid in church building.

Several English bishops have requested their clergy to appoint in their parishes a day of humiliation for the sins of the nation.

The North college, an institution of the general synod, South, will close at the end of the present session for lack of means.

AS NIGHT CAME DARKLY DOWN.

The night came darkly down:
The birdies' mother said,
"Peep! peep!
You ought to be asleep!
'Tis time my little ones were safe in bed!"
So, sheltered by her wings in downy nest,
The weary little birdlings took their rest.

The night came darkly down;
The baby's mother said,
"Bye-low!
You mustn't frolic so!
You should have been asleep an hour ago!"
And nestling close to its mother's breast,
The merry prattler sank to quiet rest.

Then in the cradle soft
'T was laid with tenderest care.
"Good-night!
Sleep till the morning light!"
Whispered the mother as she breathed a prayer.
Night settled down: the gates of day were barred,
And only loving angels were on guard.

TALES FOR TODDLERS.

Only a Cent.

Uncle Harris was a carpenter, and had a shop in the country. One day he went into the barn where Dick and Joe were playing with two tame pigeons.

"Boys," he said, "my workshop ought to be swept up every evening. Which of you will undertake to do it? I am willing to pay a cent for each sweeping."

"Only a cent!" said Dick. "Who would work for a cent?"

"I will," said Joe. "A cent is better than nothing."

So every day, when Uncle Harris was done working in the shop, Joe would take an old broom and sweep it. And he dropped all his pennies into his tin savings bank.

One day Uncle Harris took Dick and Joe to town with him. While he went to buy some lumber, they stayed in a toy shop, where there were toys of every kind.

"What fine kites!" said Dick. "I wish I could buy one."

"Only 10 cents," said the man behind the counter.

"I haven't even a cent," said Dick.

"I have 50 cents," said Joe, "and I think I will buy that bird-kite."

"How did you get 50 cents," asked Dick.

"By sweeping the shop," answered Joe. "I saved my pennies, and did not open my bank until this morning."

Joe bought the bird-kite and a fine large knife, while Dick went home without anything. But he had learned not to despise little things, and he was very glad to sweep the shop whenever Joe would let him, even though he received for his work only a cent.

Francie in Florida.

There is a little golden-haired girl who lives away down in Florida. Her name is Francie, and she is five years old. Francie and her elder sister, Minnie, have grand times in Florida. The weather is fine and pleasant. The flowers are blooming almost all the year. There is never any snow or ice. Francie has never seen any snow. When she finds a picture with snow in it, she is always very much interested, and asks a great many questions about it.

Francie and Minnie have a great many pets. They live on a farm near the city, and their pets are company for them. They have a pet colt whose mother died when she was one month old. They call her Baby, because at first they had to feed her with gruel made of corn meal and milk. She is old enough now to eat grass all day. She is very gentle. She is of a bright sorrel color, with one little white spot in her forehead.

Then there is a pet turkey which eats from their hands, a pet kitten named Dot, a puppy named Fox, a wee little red calf which is yet so young that it has no name, and a great many little chickens, of all of which they are very fond.

Francie and Minnie go out in the field sometimes and pick cotton, and they think it great fun. They wear large sun-bonnets to keep off the sun. Sometimes they go out with the men in the wagon, drawn by Old Jim, the horse, after hay or fodder. They have a jolly time riding home on the top of the load. They go blackberrying. They pick strawberries, and climb up in the fig-trees and eat figs. They do many other queer things that the little city children know nothing about. But they also like to go to town and get candy and ice cream and oranges.

Why Teddy Didn't Go.

"I'm going to run away," said Teddy to Dick. "I'm going over to my Aunt Nelly's house."

Teddy was a very little boy. He wore a kilted skirt, and he could not speak all of his words quite plainly. But he knew better than to run away, because he whispered to Dick so mamma wouldn't hear. Dick was a great, black Newfoundland dog. He was a year younger than Teddy, but he was enough bigger to make up for that. He looked up at Teddy as if he understood, and followed him off the veranda and around to the back gate.

"Don't go far, dear," called mamma after them. Surely Dick understood that. He stopped waving his plumy tail.

"No—o, ma'am," said Teddy. But he put his hand on the gate. Do you suppose he meant to go just the same?

Mamma said not to go far," he whispered to Dick. "It isn't far to Aunt Nelly's. It isn't more than a mile, Dick; and she'll make us some taffy.

Then Teddy pushed the gate open. And what do you suppose Dick did? Why, he laid himself down in the gate-way; and when Teddy tried to step over him he growled dreadfully and showed all his white teeth. Teddy tried coaxing, but Dick wouldn't be coaxed. Then he got a maple switch, but Dick wouldn't be driven. Then Teddy tried to climb over the pickets; but Dick caught hold of the kilted skirt with his teeth, and held him back. So at last Teddy made up his mind that he didn't really want to go to Aunt Nelly's house.

But he couldn't help telling mamma all about it. It was so funny. Mamma patted Dick's great black head.

"Then it was my dog who minded, and not my little boy," she said.

"But I'm going to all the rest of the time," said Teddy earnestly.

How Does Nilsson Know?

New York World: Mme. Nilsson, according to the Washington Chronicle, positively affirms that Mr. Mapleson's baldness is due to his crimes. A committee of bald-headed gentlemen, indignant and virtuous, has been formed to wait upon Mme. Nilsson and ask how she comes to know so much about Mr. Mapleson's iniquities. One of the committee told his associates yesterday Charles Lever's story of an old German lady, the wife of a professor who was fond of relating stories of his scapegrace days. The old lady, who was as deaf as a post, had a habit of corroborating what the professor said without hearing a word of it, and never failed when he laughed with a visitor over some scandalous recollection to clinch the nail with many an asseverative nod and the emphatic declaration, "Yes, I was there too." Mme. Nilsson has probably not noticed that the maples are among the first to part with their foliage.

"Oh, Freddie!"

Cleveland Letter: Just as Mrs. Langtry, in the character of Rosalind, had pronounced the words of the epilogue, "I would kiss as many of you as had beards that pleased me, complexions that liked me," and was exhibiting her most comprehensive smile to a Cleveland audience, a gallery gamin shouted, "Oh, Freddie!" with a gusto which spoiled the effect, but sent the people home in good nature.

FACTS FOR THE FARMERS.

Pruning Fruit Trees.

Correspondence of the Country Gentleman: March is the month to prune fruit trees where heavy pruning is to be done. Particularly is this the case where old decaying trees are to be rejuvenated and large limbs to be removed. The trees being in a dormant state, the shock will be less felt. All dead or nearly dead limbs may then be taken off, and a few others, where most crowded, if not main divisions of the tree, deferring farther heavy work till the year following. For thinning out branches merely, the work may all be done the first year. There is no difficulty in doing this properly, only keep the principles in view, which are the thorough airing of the tree, and the admission of sunlight to all parts of it. This always favors the healthy growth of both wood and fruit, most decidedly. Cut close to the body of the limb with a sharp knife, or a sharp fine tooth saw. In a large tree that has had little pruning much wood will thus be brought down, and as the clipping is distributed through the tree, and is confined to twigs and small limbs, there will not only be no perceptible shock, but the pruning will be equal to a coat of manure; and it is better to withhold manure the year this is done, unless much needed, as an excessive growth of wood is obtained at the expense of fruit. This is the tendency. A balance between the wood and fruit growth must be kept up. In all work with fruit trees this should be kept in view. There are many things that affect it, such as manuring or cultivating the soil, pruning, and thinning out the fruit, to which may be added shortening or lessening the roots where the ground is too rich. Where vacant places occur among the branches, new shoots should be allowed to grow to fill in, keeping all others removed that push forth. In a few years, with sufficient root power, these places will be occupied. During summer, rub off all unnecessary shoots as they appear, which will add still farther to the growth.

Date of Ripening of Potatoes.

A gentleman, who has a somewhat experimental turn of mind, contributes the following regarding the date of ripening of the varieties of potatoes named below. It may be of some service to our potato growers. They are all from single eyes planted on the 15th of May:

Name.	Time of ripening.	Product per acre.
Early Electric	Aug. 7	93⅓
Early Ohio	Aug. 15	110½
Early Mayflower	Aug. 15	177⅓
Brownell's Best	Sept. 7	237⅓
Clark's No. 1	Sept. 1	162⅔
Early Telephone	Aug. 15	175
Beauty of Hebron	Sept. 1	179⅓
Early Rose	Sept. 1	150
Magnum Bonum	Sept. 10	157¼
Late Rose	Sept. 15	194
Snowflake	Sept. 7	189
White Star	Sept. 25	206
White Elephant	Sept. 25	232
Burbank	Sept. 25	220
Matchless	Sept. 15	135
Pride of America	Sept. 25	191⅓
Late Snowflake	Sept. 25	228⅓
Belle	Sept. 15	225
Defiance	Oct. 1	382⅔

Training Vicious Horses.

A very simple method, and an improvement upon the Rarey system, of training vicious horses was exhibited at West Philadelphia recently, and the manner in which some of the wildest horses were subdued was astonishing. The first trial was that of a kicking or balking mare, which her owner said had allowed no rider on her back for a period of at least five years. She became tame in about as many minutes, and allowed herself to be ridden about without a sign of her former wildness. The means by which the result was accomplished was a piece of light rope, which was passed around the front jaw of the mare just above the upper teeth, crossed in her mouth, thence secured back of her neck. It was claimed that no horse will kick or jump when thus secured, and that a horse, after receiving the treatment a few times, will abandon his vicious ways forever. A very simple method was also shown by which a kicking horse could be shod. It consisted in connecting the animal's head and tail by means of a rope fastened to the tail and then to the bit, and then drawn tightly enough to incline the animal's head to one side. This, it is claimed, makes it absolutely impossible for a horse to kick on the side of the rope. At the same exhibition a horse, which for many years had to be bound on the ground to be shod, suffered the blacksmith to operate on him without attempting to kick while secured in the manner described.

The Dust Bath for Poultry.

Those knowing the value of the dust bath for fowls, summer and winter, consider it essential to successful poultry keeping. And how few of our poultry keepers give their fowls a chance to revel in a heap of loose earth, sand or ashes during their confinement in winter. The dust bath is to poultry nature's cleanser and renovator, and is as necessary for cleansing the feathers of fowls from vermin and effete matter as a cool, pure water bath is to the person of cleanly habits. Poultry with free range in summer will be able to help themselves to a dust bath if they have to roll in the newly made flower or vegetable beds. With fowls in confinement the means and material must be supplied. A dry mass of fine sand or road dust, fine loam or coal ashes will do. This mass of dry material should be under a shed to protect it from rain in summer time, and in the sunniest corner of the hen house in winter. If we watch the habits of all wild game birds, we can see them in the open clearings and on the country roads, at early sunrise, dusting themselves as rapidly as possible; and if we give our domestic fowls a chance, we can see an instinctive desire in the young as well as the old to scratch and pulverize the earth, if in lumps, and will then adjust their feathers, and, by the rapid action of their claws are enabled to dust thoroughly, and, by shaking, to rid themselves of lice. The dust bath is made more effective by putting a handful or two of sulphur and carbolic powder through the mass and mixing them together.

Manuring the Crescent Seedling Strawberry.

E. B. Underhill of Poughkeepsie states, in his lately issued strawberry catalogue, that he has found that manure and culture have a great deal to do with the quality, as well as the quantity, of the strawberries. The Crescent has been pronounced "a poor, worthless, knotty berry" on poor soil, but he continues to plant more of them each successive year, and about midwinter, or sooner, even if there is snow on the them, does all he can to smother them with manure. This berry brings varying prices according to culture, varying all the way from 3 to 12 cents, and at the latter price there "is also quadruple the quantity." It is therefore well well worth while to attend to the culture. There is no doubt that the mulching of the manure, as well as its enriching, has its influence. We discovered last summer that where the Crescent grew on an unusually rich spot of ground, it ceased to be a pistilate requiring a staminate fertilizer, but the stamens, which are commonly small and abortive, were swollen into good, well-developed pollen holders.

A Quick Way to Tell Good Seed Corn.

A correspondent contributes the following to the Indiana Farmer as a good way to test seed corn: I will contribute my plan of selecting seed corn that will be sure to grow without testing by planting. I examine grains from every ear selected by opening the heart with a sharp knife and looking at the sprout or germ. If the sprout is white, plump and brittle, it will grow; but if it is shrunken, of a yellow color, and bears the appearance of having been soaked in lye, it will not grow. The germs of last year's crop show for themselves and will not grow, and by placing side by side the germs of corn of the crops of 1881 and 1882, the difference can be plainly seen.

Sowing Orchard Grass.

Last winter I prepared ten acres of new ground without breaking, by giving it a good lap harrowing with a sharp harrow. I bought fourteen bushels of orchard grass and thirty pounds of clover seed, and sowed it some time in March, gave it another lap harrowing, kept all stock off of it until August or September, then I pastured it with four or five cattle and nine hogs until winter set in. It was then all right, and now I have the prospect for the best pasture I ever saw, and a fine set of red clover, all looking well.

No matter what your ailment is, Brown's Iron Bitters will surely benefit you.

LOVE'S LABOR LOST.

Why No Coaxing of Cupid Can Make Young New Yorkers Marry.

New York Letter in the Washington Star.

The expenses of living here are continually increasing, and already the number of men who are able to support a fair daughter of fashion in anything like the styles to which she has been accustomed is comparatively small. By able I mean that a man be the possessor of an assured income of at least $5,000 a year in order to make his wife mistress of an establishment such as will enable her to at all keep up her social position. I ought to have said double that sum, for with house rent, to begin with, at the lowest $2,000, and there are few houses in good neighborhoods which can be got for that sum, $5,000 will be but genteel poverty. Even with an income of $10,000 a year a reception a Delmonico's, costing $1,600 and perhaps $2,000, in addition to expensive dinner parties, $5,000 yearly for cab hire. Worth gowns, etc., etc., cannot be given more than once in a life time. Out-of-town people who continue to be happy on as many hundreds a year cannot perhaps understand why it should cost ten times that amount to render life endurable in New York and may maintain that "going into society" is not an essential to happiness.

But consider the case of the young man of the period who has an income of say $3,000. On such a salary he can belong to several fashionable clubs, give a few theatre parties in the course of the winter, spend a portion of the summer at Newport or Saratoga and be considered of consequence enough to be invited to balls and dinner parties in the houses of the "best," people all the year around. His marriage, of course, would change all that. If a married pair can barely keep in society on $5,000 a year, of course marriage on not much more than half that would be social ostracism. People in New York who do not entertain are not invited to other people's entertainments, and an income of only $3,000 would only permit of living in a flat, not large enough to entertain in, even if one could afford to do so. Can the young man of the period, therefore, be expected to give up his pleasant life for one which would lack all that makes his present life enjoyable?

THOMAS H. BENTON.

His Encounter in the Senate With Foote.

Ben Perley Poore, in the April Century.

Inferior in intellectual ability to Webster, Clay or Calhoun, Thomas Hart Benton had no superior as a man of iron will and haughty disposition, during the twenty-nine years and seven months that he served continuously in the United States Senate. Aggressive, bold and defiant, he would occasionally strike out recklessly at everything and everybody about him, like the huge wild buffaloes of the Missouri prairies, treading his opponents beneath his feet in his angry rush. His greatest display of ungovernable rage in the senate chamber was when, in an angry debate, he advanced with threatening gestures toward Senator Foote, of Mississippi, who, fearing that he was to be attacked, drew a small pocket-pistol. The sight of this weapon made Benton uncontrollable; and, endeavoring to shake off the grasp of friends who seized him, he shouted: "The cowardly assassin, let him shoot me if he dares. I never carry arms, and he knows it. Let the assassin fire!" After quiet was somewhat restored, Clay suggested that both senators enter into bonds to keep the peace. Upon that Benton arose and exclaimed; "I will rot in jail, sir, before I will do it: No, Sir! I will rot in jail first!" and he proceeded to pour forth a torrent of bitter invective on Foote before he could be quieted. Even when he was defeated in seeking a reelection for the sixth time in the Senate, and was forced to accept a seat in the House of Representatives, Benton failed to display a chastened ambition or a softened heart.

Sergeant Mason Almost Forgotten.

Washington Dispatch to New York Tribune.

The skeleton of the assassin Guiteau is in the Army Museum, the same building where Lincoln fell by the hand of another assassin. Sergeant Mason, who fired a shot into the jail where the "inspired" monster lay awaiting his doom, lingers in prison, and is undergoing a sentence of eight years at hard labor. The penalty of dishonorable discharge from the army, with forfeiture of all his pay and allowances, a very harsh and hard part of his punishment, he has already paid. Subscriptions for the benefit of his wife and child have ceased, and apparently all legal efforts on his behalf have been abandoned. His case is not wholly forgotten, however, and occasionally petitions in his behalf are received at the War Department from people who believe that the sentence of the Court-martial was too severe, and that Mason is a proper subject for Executive clemency. Neither the President nor Secretary of War has taken any action.

An Incompetent Boy.

From the Wall Street Daily News.

Last fall a Baltimore hardware dealer, who had a bill against a blacksmith in an adjacent village, sent it out by his collector for payment. Upon arriving in the village the collector found the shop, but not the smith, and after a long hunt discovered him on his own doorstep, elbows on his knees and chin on his hands.

"I bays no pills," replied the smith, as the account was handed him.

"Why, what's the matter, Mr. Coon?"

"Vhell, der matter ish dot I haf failed in peesness and I doan pay nobody."

"Failed? Have you actually failed?"

"I haf."

"Well, you'll have to pay me in full just the same. Under the laws of the state no man can fail unless he locks his doors, and as I passed the shop yours were wide open."

"Dunder und blitzen! dot vhas the carelessness of my poy Show! How much is dot pill? I pays him queek und runs down und nails oop der doors myself! Dunder! but dot poy never makes a Yankee, if he lifs here a tousand years!"

Amending Homestead Entries.

The secretary of the interior has decided that an application to amend a homestead entry is a matter of right only when necessary to correct a mistake, clerical or otherwise, which would result in depriving the settler of his actual home or valuable improvements. If allowed in any case as a matter of executive discretion to enable him to take the full quantity allowed by law and to avoid conflict with other asserted claims, the new lands sought to be included must be actually vacant and free from adverse rights, legal or equitable, so that no injustice to any other person shall result therefrom.

Midway between Winnipeg and St. Vincent, there was a collision and William Robinson, engineer on the express was killed, and William Blackwell of Burford, Ontario, injured, probably fatally. Several passengers were slightly bruised.

Over $900,000 a year is spent in this country for dolls.

HOUSE AND FARM.

Miscellaneous Farm Notes.

A good mixture for pasture is five pounds of orchard grass, four pounds of timothy, six pounds of red-top, two pounds of meadow fescue, two pounds of yellow oat grass, and one pound of white clover, it can be sown with oats as well as other grain, but the oats should be rather thin—not more than two bushels per acre.

Rich garden soil that has been manured with stable manure for several years requires a change of fertilizers. It becomes filled with organic matter and needs more mineral. Wood ashes or fresh lime, or both of them, would supply what is needed. When the land is very rich too much of these can scarcely be used; a bushel to the square rod would be too much. Carrots and beets require lime and ashes especially, and peas and beans also are benefited by them. Either may be applied on the surface and harrowed in the soil before planting.

Saltpetre has been found an excellent insecticide in some instances, and this salt is also a good fertilizer, and therefore answers a double purpose. One tablespoonful of saltpetre dissolved in a pail of warm water is a most valuable solution with which to sprinkle cabbage plants infested with the caterpillars of the cabbage butterfly. Several applications will usually be necessary, for the butterflies remain a long time, and the females visit the cabbages daily to deposit their eggs, from which the caterpillars are hatched in sucession during the early summer as well as autumn months.

The dairy is a safer business than keeping sheep and freer from some peculiar risks incident to sheep keeping. A cow should return $50 a year and seven sheep should be kept where one cow can be. But a sheep will not return $7 in a year, except in those cases in which the lambs can be sold at high prices as early market lambs and the sheep can be sold as mutton. The dairy business can be carried on anywhere, as the freight on butter is small, and if it is conducted with skill a much larger income than $50 a year may be secured. For these reasons, as a rule, dairying is better business than keeping sheep.

For and About Women.

To prolong the active life of the broom, dip it in hot suds once a week, then shake it and bang it.

See that there are no offensive odors in your cellars or about your houses.

An excellent cement for mending china is formed by stirring into a thick solution of gum-arabic sufficient plaster-of-paris to make a thick paste. Apply with a brush to the fractured edges and press them together. In three days the article will be ready for use.

"Will slips of geraniums taken this spring make plants for winter flowering?" "They will give fine bloom, but not enough for succession; you will need some older plants. Select or buy some that were started last summer, plant in in a rich, sunny bed, pinch out the tops, cut back long branches, so as to make stock plants, pot them in September. These, with the younger stock, will serve you during the next winter.

The London Medical Record says of the daughters of Eve: "Many women complain of feeling tired after a short walk, whilst they are really carrying a weight which would soon tire a strong man. Their waists are encircled by a belt or hoop, to which a load heavier than a felon's chains is attached, and the shoulders and chest are compressed by an additional burden."

Hair that has once been completely destroyed cannot be recovered. Hair grows from a root or bulb that is enveloped in a gland known as the hair follicle; this is situated in the dermis or true skin. If the epidermis only is destroyed these hair follicles remain uninjured, but if the whole skin is destroyed a new growth will either have no follicles in it or ones that produce white hair from the absence of the usual pigment cells which color the hair. If the follicles are not reproduced no hair can be grown; but if they are there, but weak and dormant, they may be made active by the application of a stimulant, such as alcohol with one-twentieth part of tincture of cantharides, rubbed into the skin.

Preserving Milk for Future Use.

Milk is so necessary an article in most families that it ought to be preserved for use when none can be obtained. This may be done by any housekeeper with a little care. Place over a moderate fire in a tin-pan or a nice iron kettle; let it slowly evaporate till it becomes of the consistency of thin cream, then put in clean cans or bottles, seal up and keep in a cool place where it will not freeze. When wanted for use dilute with water. Sal-soda dissolved in water is good to sweeten cans or bottles after they are rinsed out. It is also good for rinsing churns, jars and other things.

Connubial Tribulations.

Why is there so much connubial tribulation in the world? Many reasons might be stated. Dean Swift says the reason why so few marriages are happy is because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages. But it is manifestly absurd and unfair to saddle all the blame upon the wives in this way. George Eliot tells us that marriage must be a relation either of sympathy or of conquest; and it is undoubtedly true that much of the matrimonial discord that exists arises from the mutual struggle for supremacy. They go to church and say "I will," and then, perhaps, on the way home one or the other says "I won't," and that begins it. Some one has said that conjugal affections largely depends on mutual confidence. A friend of ours quoted the sentiment the other day in the smoking room, and added that he made it a rule to tell his wife everything that had happened, and in this way they avoided any misunderstanding. "Well, sir," remarked another gentleman present, not to be outdone in generosity, "you are not so open and frank as I am, for I tell my wife a good many things that never happen." "Oh!" exclaimed a third, "I am under no necessity to keep my wife informed regarding my affairs. She can find out five times as much as I know myself without the least trouble."

Salt for Animals, Etc.

Is salt absolutely necessary for all animals, and vegetables, and what function does it perform in their economy?

ANS.—Anything that may be contained in a plant or animal is indispensable to its life. Salt, or its elements, chlorine and sodium—which when combined in certain proportions form salt—are found in all plants and in the blood and secretions of all animals, as well as in the flesh. Animals that feed upon vegetables do not as a rule get a sufficient quantity of salt, as may be inferred from the eagerness with which they seek and take it. The gastric juice, formed largely of hydrochloric acid and salt, is the agent which supplies this to the stomach. If salt were not supplied, an animal would first suffer from indigestion, then from disorder of the blood and no doubt disease, and finally death might occur in course of time. There is no doubt that many instances of so-called depraved appetite are merely the results of a want of salt.—Rural New Yorker.

How to Raise Calves.

From the Manchester Mirror and Farmer.

If I wish to raise a calf dropped in winter, I let it lie with the cow one or two days and let it suck as much, and as often, as it pleases, unless the cow's udder is caked. I then milk all I can before the calf sucks. After the first two days I take the calf away and let it go to its mother only twice a day until a week or ten days old; then let him go without one feed, so as to be pretty hungry; then put my fingers in the warm milk and put them in his mouth, at the same time bearing his nose down into the warm milk, in the pail, and so soon as he gets well sucking, slip the finger from the mouth and let the calf drink, if he will, a few swallows; if not repeat the operation, two or three times, until he gets a good taste of the milk; then leave him until the next feeding time, and then try him in the same way, and if he will not drink, let him go until he will. Few will go beyond the third time trying. I seldom have one which will not drink some the second time. When they get so they will drink, it is a good plan not to give a full mess for two or three days, but let them be rather hungry, at each time of feeding, until they get the habit of drinking well formed. As soon as this is done, place a trough or dish with some meal in it in such a situation that they cannot turn it over. Nail it up against the side of the stall or pen in which the calf is kept, but convenient to get at, and let him eat all he will, which will not be very much. Place a little hay so he can get it, either rowen or early cut herdsgrass is best. The best meal for a young calf is a mixture of oats and corn, ground in the cob, two bushels of the former, to one of the latter. At four weeks old, skimmed milk slightly warmed, may be substituted for new milk, but for a while should not be allowed to stand until it gets very sour. After eight weeks, they may be fed and will do well, if given a fair allowance of meal upon milk that is ever so old and sour.

Care for Home Toilets.

There are some women, too many, who dress at home in such a style that they are always ashamed to be seen by anybody but home folks. If a knock at the front door is heard, they run and hide, or wait till they have "primped up" before opening it. In their creed anything is good enough for home-folks; all nice things—nice clothes, food, dainties must be saved for company. Any old calico or woolen dress is good enough to do housework in, any old worn-out shoes good enough to wear round the house. As a natural result of this theory, the parlor is always shut up save on great occasions, the sitting-room is rarely used, and the family life passes entirely in the kitchen. It is no unusual thing for women who hold theories and carry them out in practice, to find no time to comb their hair till after the dinner work is done, and go round with it in a frowse two-thirds of the day. This is perhaps the same with farmers' wives more than with any other class of work-people. The mechanic's wife has got her breakfast and told her husband good-bye for the rest of the day by 6 o'clock in the morning, but at that hour the farmer's wife sees no opening place for hours to come. Milk, cream, butter, chickens, pigs, calves, children, hired help, keep her hands and her thoughts busy, too busy to think of how she looks while at her work. But how she looks is continually impressed on her children, her husband, her servants, if she has them, and this impression often results in the going of her sons to cities and into trade or mechanics rather than staying on the farm. It results in a preference on her daughter's part for professional men and mechanics rather than farmers for their husbands. Nothing is more natural.

To antidote this unfortunate result, a pretty and tasteful home toilet will be found very efficient. Calico of fair quality can be purchased at 8 cents a yard, and with a clean calico dress on and a nice calico apron the housewife may be always dressed up while at her work. If she unvaryingly combs her hair before engaging in any morning task, her hair will be in order for the day, and a lesson of value will be set her entire household. A bit of edging in her neck may take the place of a collar, if the collar is too much trouble; and neatly attired in fresh calico and whole shoes she need not run and hide if there comes a knock at the door. The farmer's wife who is careful of her own appearance while at her work will have a better opportunity for and more influence in persuading her husband to look no worse than he need to while at his work than she who cares for none of these things. It is sensible and wise to dress according to one's work, but there is surely no reason in the shabby appearance seen in so many of our farmers while at their work. A reasonable attention to externals fortifies one's self-respect and certainly does not lessen the respect of others.

Sweetening of Fish and Muskrats.

The New York papers all had full reports of the Vanderbilts' fancy dress ball and so did the outside papers. But the reports were all alike. No newspaper men, as such, were admitted, but a report was furnished—in advance—by some member of the family to the Associated Press. The ball is said to have reconciled the great intestinal feud between the Astors and the Vanderbilts, the Vanderbilts trying to get into the sacred social precincts of the Astors and the Astors trying to keep them out. The trouble has been on a very important point—whether the Astor family got the odor of the mink skins and muskrat pelts, which old John Jacob used to sell, out of the family pedigree, before the Vanderbilt's disinfected their family of the smell of the oysters and fish which Cornelius used to peddle from his canal boat. The Astors declared that they were deodorized first, but the fancy ball seems to have sweetened the Vanderbilts' skirts, and the Astors attended it. The republic is now safe.—Detroit Free Press.

Pressure of Tall Structures.

The pressure per square foot in pounds, of various structures upon their foundations are given as follows: The dome on the United States capital, 13,477 pounds; Girard college, Philadelphia, 13,445; St. Peters', Rome, 33,340; St. Paul's, London, 30,450; St. Genevieve, Paris, 60,000; Toussaint, Angers, 90,000. It has also been made a matter of architectural record that the basilica of St. Paul's church, London, bears upon its foundation with a weight of 42,950 pounds per square foot, the dome of the Invalides, Paris, with a weight of 31,800, and that of the Pantheon, Paris 43,440. The pressure of foundation per square foot on the soil beneath is found to be in the case of Bunker Hill Monument five and one-half tons on hard sand and gravel; Brooklyn anchorage of the East river bridge, resting on fine sand, loam, and gravel, four tons; new capital at Albany, founded on blue clay, containing about twenty-five per cent. of sand, and a little loam, two tons; Trinity church spire, New York, on course sand with a slight mixture of clay, as first built, settled badly and was taken down—the same as rebuilt, three and one-half tons; tower of Brick church, corner of Fifth avenue and West Thirty-seventh street, New York, resting on hard pan, seven tons; St. Rollox chimney, Glasgow, 450 feet high, resting on sandstone rock, two tons.

The Tuileries.

Nicholas de Neuville, Lord of Villeroi, whose ancient home stood for centuries in the Rue des Bourdonnais of old Paris, and who, in 1522, purchased additional honor, dignity and power from his needy and knightly monarch, Francis I. with the sum of 50,000 livers, also lives in history as the builder of the first Tuileries. It was erected among the sandy hills, pits and hollows where the old slaughter houses of the butchers were, or had been, and where the old tile kiln then stood. It was surrounded with gardens and commanded, from its walls and towers, noble views of wood and river. The Seine ran close beside it, and a little way from it stood the Louvre, then a vast royal fortress, palace and prison, with little windows strongly barred and grated, walls thirteen feet in thickness, a forest of extinguisher topped turrets, isolated by a moat as wide as a river, and with a gigantic central tower, or keep, frowning direst feudal threats upon all the country round. Before the tile kilns were put up the spot had been called La Sablonniere, and had for centuries been that to which the scavengers of Paris carted the mud and refuse of the city's dirty lanes, courts and pestilence-breeding alleys. When Louise de Savoy, countess of Angouleme, and widowed mother of Francis I, complained that her palace of Tournelles—another gloomy feudal stronghold—was dreary and unwholesome—the king in 1518 purchased for her the hotel and garden in the tuileries from the Lord of Villeroi, and in it she resided till about 1525, when she bestowed it upon Jean Tiercelein, maitre d'hotel to the Dauphin, and to Julia Dutret, his wife, for their lives. After the deaths of Jean and Julia the property reverted to the Crown, and in 1563, when the strong and lordly Palais des Tournelles—so called from the great number of its turrets and towers—was demolished, in the "noble populace spirit, because Henry II had died there from a wound in the eye, accidentally received at a tournament while tilting against the unhappy gallant, Count de Montgomery, the King's widow, Catharine de Medicis, determined to build on the site of the Hotel des Tuileries a magnificent new palace which should rival in grandeur the palaces of her native land—Italy. For this purpose she bought the surrounding field, and a considerable number of detached buildings which had sprung up around the castle of the Lord of Villeroi. The most famous architects of her day, Philibert Delorme and John Bullant—both educated for their profession in Italy—were instructed to prepare designs in the Grecian style; and in the month of May, 1564, the foundation stone was laid with much state and ceremony. Catherine herself—if Delorme, the flatterer and courtier, may be credited—designed the main portion of the edifice; and she was so delighted with the artistic excellencies of this artist's share of the work—the decorative—that she bestowed upon him two abbeys, although he was not an ecclesiastic, and also obtained for him the offices of the King's counselor and almoner. These honors, bestowed upon one whom the French people regarded merely as a builder, and not as an artist, provoked no little ridicule and scorn. The famous poet Rousard mocked him bitterly in a satirical effusion called "The Trowel turned Crosier," thereby awakening the artist's wrath.—Tinsley's Magazine.

EXTRAORDINARY BUILDING

A Dwelling House 5 Feet Wide, 50 Feet Deep, and 4 Stories High.

N. Y. Evening Post.

The narrowest house in this city may be seen at the northwest corner of Lexington avenue and Eighty-second street. When Lexington avenue was cut through some years ago, a strip of land five feet wide and one hundred feet deep was all that was left of a certain lot belonging to a person who did not own the next lot on the street. The strip, while of little value by itself, would be valuable to a person owning the adjoining lot on Eighty-second street, because it would not only enable him to build a house five feet wider, but would give him windows all along the side of his house on Lexington avenue. The two owners, however, could not agree as to terms, and a house was erected on the lot adjoining the narrow strip. The owner of the latter had nothing to do but to abandon his lot, or build a house five feet wide upon it. The latter course was perhaps adopted because such a house would shut up all the side windows of the neighboring building, and considerably reduce its value.

The new building, which has been finished for some months, is therefore 5 feet wide, 100 feet deep, and 4 stories high. It is divided into two houses, each 50 feet long, and the entrance doors are, of course, on the avenue, as there is no room for a door at either end of the building. The law allows a building at the corner of a street to have projecting bay windows along the side and taking advantage of this circumstance, the architect has managed to plan a house which, while peculiar in inside appearance, and probably very uncomfortable to live in, may find tenants. Without these bay-windows or square projections running from the foundations to the roof it would not have been possible to build a house at all, for no room would have been wider than three feet. Each house has therefore two bay windows, in one of which are the stairs and in the other one room about eight feet wide by fifteen feet long, upon each floor. The long passage between the stair-well and the room is about three feet wide. Each house contains a kitchen eight by fifteen feet and four rooms, each of the same size, but on different floors. There are also ingeniously placed closets at each end of the building and under the stairs. Both houses are unoccupied. One is offered for rent at $500 a year.

If the object of these extraordinary houses was simply to shut out the light from his neighbor's building, he would probably have accomplished the same end at much less expense by adopting Mr. George Kemp's device of sheet-iron shields. Mr. Kemp did not wish the occupants of the building in the rear of his house at No. 720 Fifth avenue to overlook his premises, and so he built an iron scaffolding in his back yard and placed iron shields against the obnoxious openings, shutting out air and light as completely as a brick wall would have done. This arrangement has been for years the source of no little comment from the neighbors and passers-by.

It is said in Colorado that no native resident of the State has ever died there of consumption.

A GIRL'S FIRST LOVE.

"Are there no underwriters for human hopes? for the precious of interests is there no insurance?

I had been tempted all day, tempted by fate and the devil. All summer long I had been trying to clasp hands for a life journey with a man I did not love; a man noble of soul and born to the purple, who set up his high lineage against my poor gifts of beauty and song. He threw some love into the scale, too, but I, God help me, had none to give in return. I had bartered erewhile my whole possessions for a few glances of a dark, dark eye, and my note had gone to protest.

Could I, could I? It kept following me about with fateful persistency, for tonight I was to give my answer to my high-born lover.

I tried to look things in the face, to count the cost.

Money was a good thing; it insured one warmth in winter and delicious coolness in summer, and prettiness and daintiness, and the entrance into good society. Yes, money was a good thing, and position and power, and houses and lands. So far good; but my soul hungered and thirsted for a love commensurate with my own, which this man, who offered me purple and gold, had it not in his power to give, or, let me qualify that, had it not in his nature to give.

The stars came out golden and soft, and the fragrant summer dusk crept around me where I sat inhaling the scent of the rose. Ambition and love tore my heart by turn, and weariness, too, put in a poor, pitiful plea, for I was so tired, so tired.

It was a brilliant future that Reginald Dacre offered me, wherein toil and weariness could never come. I thought of the purple and fine linen; the luxurious rest; the emoluments! Then my daily life passed in review before me—that of companion to a haughty, fine lady, and a singer in a fashionable church, among fashionable saints and sinners. I began to croon over the old satire;

In a church which is garnished with mullion and gable,
With altar and reredos, with gargoyle and groin,
The penitents' dresses are sealskin and sable,
The odor of sanctity's eau de cologne.
But surely if Lucifer flying from Hades,
Could gaze at this crowd with its paniers and paints,
He would say, looking round at the lords and the ladies,
O, where is All Sinners if this is All Saints?

I had entered upon this life from an unloved and unloving home, a home doled out to me by the tardy justice of a granduncle who had robbed me of my inheritance, I thought at first I might find the sangreal somewhere in this new country which seemed so fair, but, alas! I had not even heard the swish of wings.

I thought of it all—the fever and the fret; the petty jars; the misunderstandings; the pain of incomprehension; the unguerdoned toil; the lagging hours; the awful pauses.

This or marriage; this or marriage. It seemed written like a placard on earth and sky. It seemed bound like phylactery upon the brows of the people as they passed to and fro; and soon the word marriage lost all its significance for me, as the words do after oft repeating. Did it mean misery or happiness, bliss or woe? This marriage that rung its changes through my brain—was it God-appointed? Did it mean God's blessing or His curse?

You know I did not love this man who offered me rest from my labors. He had not power to evoke one thrill to his call. But then love is only one reason why one should marry a man. There might be love and plenty of money, and yet one be hungry all one's life. I have known such things.

I had tried to make my life straight and fair. I had tried to keep clean hands and a pure heart; tried—God, who knows the secrets of all hearts, knows this—to fight despair.

* * 'Long, green days,
Worn bare of grass and sunshine; long, calm nights
From which the silken sleeps were fretted out—
Be witness for me.

We see through shadows all our life long. We come into this world without our being given a choice as to our advent, and go out of it in the same manner.

We have not been consulted as to birth or death. More and more the prayers of Epictetus haunts me: "Lead me, Zeus and Destiny, whithersoever I am appointed to go; I will follow without wavering; even though I turn coward and shrink, I shall follow all the same."

Should I marry Mr. Dacre? Was he a good parti, as the world said? Too good for me, as my lady elegantly phrased it.

I had been born into the world amid fierce throes of mental anguish. Throughout the pain of her travail my mother's heart was rent with the greater pain of my father's sudden death—drowned off the Cornish coast, for I was born at sea. She lived until I was 10 years old; a life of sorrow, and poverty and renunciation. Then she died, leaving me to the care of a compassionate world and my uncle. Of him I have already spoken.

My life dragged on with clogged wheels. I was always at war with my surroundings. Though to proud to express it, I had never realized my ideal of womanhood, or in any way grown up to my aspirations and dreams. If I had grown at all it had been through pain and repression—fatal thing always for a warm hearted, earnest woman.

My uncle, Edward Earl, had procured me friendship (?) of the lady in whose house I had passed a twelvemonth—Mrs. Lucien Granger, a distant cousin of his own. I was an unsalaried governess or companion, our remote cousinship being always made available by my uncle. It was during my residence with the lady that my fate came to me.

A young nephew of Mrs. Granger's came to the hall. He was an artist, young and handsome, and fresh from a four years' sojourn in Rome.

I need not weary you with the prologue or the epilogue of our love, for words are so poor to express the heart's utterance. O Golden days! O tender, passionate night! O princely heart come back to me!

Alan Leighton was the last son of a high-born family, and because of the blue blood—the united blood of all the Howards—flowing in his veins, Mrs. Granger interposed her fiat against our love, dreading, doubtless, the plebian mixture of mine.

It is a pity that blood does not always tell. It was an inglorious triumph to me—yet still a triumph—to bare my white arms to the shoulder during our gala nights—to which my voice was always invited—contrasting their satiny smoothness and perfect contour with the lean, brown appendages Mrs. Granger folded over her aristocratic heart.

But a cloud crept into the sky, and its shadow fell across our path.

Alan was called suddenly by telegram to England, where his grand old father lay dying. We had but a moment for our farewells, for Alan's heart was rent with sorrow, and I helped to expedite his departure.

But one letter ever reached me. His father was dead, and he was Sir Alan now.

MY PRECIOUS HELEN: My father, whom I loved and respected above all men, died yesterday. I need not tell you how desolate we feel, and how the light seems to have died out of every nook and corner. My dear mother is prostrated with the blow which has taken away the lover of her youth, and I shall not be able to return to you for some weeks. Announce our betrothal, dearest, to my aunt and uncle, which you know, was my intention the very night I was called away. Be true to me, my darling Helen, as I shall be true to you. Good night, dear love. I shall write at length as soon as the mother and I have matured our plans for her lonely future. Good-night, good night. May angels guard you, and may the good Father fold about you His everlasting arms.

Your friend and lover,
ALAN LEIGHTON.

Two years had dragged their slow length along since that letter came, and I had never heard from Alan, though craving his presence as the prisoner craves the sunshine. I had written him once, and I had regretted even that. "He was soon to be married to an earl's handsome daughter," Mrs. Granger read aloud from an open letter in her hand; "in fact, it was an old affair, prior to his visit to the hall," etc., etc.

How I regretted I had written, though the words had been few, merely asking if he had been enabled to procure me a certain book we had made mention of together, and the time was more than a year ago when I had the right thus to address him. And now! O pitiful Christ! another woman was to be his wife, and I must never think of the old days, or the old dreams, or look into his dark eyes, or feel his kisses upon my unkissed lips! Never! and I might live fifty years.

And O the pity of it, out of all this world's million possibilities I had only the chance of two—either to wed Reginald Dacre, a man old enough to be my father, or to be a companion to some haughty woman. I had decided upon accepting Mr. Dacre. The tiny note of barely two lines I had placed between the leaves of a book it was his nightly custom to read.

But Alan! but Alan! I had thought him so true, so noble. I had called him "my prince," "my king," alone in the warm dusk under the stars.

"I will not soil thy purple with my dust," I had whispered in my heart. "Nor breathe my poison on thy Venice glass." * * * I went down to the sea to listen to its sullen roar; hear it tell its tale of human misery; of fair faces dead under its waves: of gold and jewels lying on green beds of moss; of argosies gone down, the wail of human misery their requiem. I tried to remember all this, so that mine might not seem such a great thing amid a world of sobbing and tears. It was a good thing to think of the sufferings of others, and try to ignore your own; a good thing. But, my misery! the misery of the girl called Helen Preston!

This girl was somewhat of a genius, the people said. She possessed the gift of song and she was handsome, too, men said. And she had two chances in the world, and if she had had money enough to have utilized her gift of song she might have had three.

But she had smirched her soul, for all her beauty and gifts; had been false to herself, to God and humanity; false, too, to Reginald Dacre, for she kept her love for Alan locked in her heart.

"I have sold my soul for houses and lands," she said, "and I am wrecked. Mea culpa! Mea culpa!"

"I have sold myself with open eyes," she said "knowingly, with malice prepense. I have no one to blame. That Alan forgot his vows did not make it right that I should forswear myself."

But the sea, with its fuss and fret, made my heart ache, and the turbulent water seemed wooing me thitherward. The chimes of our quaint old church, playing an old song, caused a choke in my throat. I would go and invoke grand airs from the organ, and mayhap I should forget the sea's roar.

It was my wont to go there to practice, and I knew the service would not be held for a half-hour. The lights were turned down to a semi-darkness, and the old sexton, with whom I was a favorite, had left the key in the door for me. The moon shone across the organ keys and across my face; and the trailing folds of my white dress looked almost ghastly in its light. O quaint old church! O quaint old chimes! Too soon I would be far away from you, over the sea to my suitor's lordly home, carrying with me a heavier heart than my years should warrant.

But it was to late to look back; and the fault was mine. I had ruined my own life, and must pay the price. Because I had been forbidden the desire of mine eyes, I had sealed my fate. I had bound my hands, and had intoned Phœbe Cary's wailing words:

I have turned from the good gifts Thy bounty supplied me,
Because of the one which Thy wisdom denied me;
I have bandaged mine eyes—yes, mine own hand's have bound me;
I have made me a darkness when light was around me.
Now I cry by the wayside, O Lord, that I might receive back my sight.

"Peccavi," I cried, and my head sank upon the organ and tears stained the red rose at my throat.

"Helen!" and my head was lifted gently and Alan Leighton's tender eyes met mine. "Alan!" was all that my astonishment could utter.

"My girl, you have suffered," he ejaculated, in a tone of exquisite tenderness. "Helen, my first and only love how we have been wronged. I only learned, an hour before I embarked, that you were not the false woman you had painted to me. Mrs. Granger wrote me eighteen months ago that you had 'married Mr. Dacre, and left with him for Cuba.' A subsequent letter, without date or signature, inclosing the tiny pearl pin I had given you, left me no room for doubt. I left England forever—and have been on the wing ever since, finding no rest for my heart on sea or shore. Helen, I suffered as few men suffer because of losing you, and because of your apparent falseness. But I could not waste my whole life because of a woman's untruth, so I tied up the broken threads and tried not to look back. It was by chance I met Herman Sloan, and in the midst of mutual confidence he asked me why I had never returned to America and to the beautiful Helen Preston, who had declined all suitors, and was still unwed. Helen, I embarked that afternoon, and I am here, never to be parted from my darling. When will we married, sweet?"

'Married! Alan," and the dreary present recurring to me, I withdrew myself from his arms, and almost unconsciously my lips framed the words:

I had died for this last year to know
You had loved me. Who shall turn on fate?
I care not if love come or go
Now; through your love seek mine for mate,
It is too late.

"Too late! Helen, my love, explain your meaning for God's sake."

Then came a broken, disjointed tale of my sorrow and temptation when I heard of his handsome and high born bride; of my weariness of the hall; of Mrs. Granger; of myself, of Mr. Dacre's constant wooing, and at last of the little note only this night thrust between the leaves of his book, making Alan's coming forever to late for my happiness.

Rapid hoof-beats along the road, and my courtly lover came in sight.

"Saved! Alan," and my words came thick and fast.

"Engage him in conversation, Alan, regarding the hall, Mrs. Granger, the weather, stocks, etc., I will escape by the vestry door, fly to the hall! secure the note! and then, O, Alan!"

"My darling my bright darling!" but I broke from his clasp and sped away like a chamois to the hall. I did not heed that the roses fell from my throat, that a portion of my lace flounces graced a thornbush, or that my hair, unloosened from its fastenings, hung about my shoulders. I think if I had possessed a piece of paper I should have shouted a reprieve!

Shall I try to tell of how I secured the note and hid it in my bosom, of how I ran up stairs and peeped for one moment into the mirror, twisting up my shining hair, and trying to hush the loud beating of my heart, of how I rapidly traversed the path leading to the church, dodging behind an osage hedge to escape meeting Mr. Dacre, hurrying on as soon as I was free, to be folded close to Alan's heart?

"And you will not laugh at me, Alan?"

"Laugh at you, my darling, and wherefore?"

"Oh, for my mad flight, for the red roses scattered all along the road, for my unbounded joy at your return; for proposing to run and steal the note, and, and—things."

For answer came tender kisses pressed upon brow and lips, and closed eyes, and Mr. Lord Lovel (Mr. Dacre) rode forth from the castle gates alone.—Chicago Tribune.

Personal Paragraphs.

Just before his assassination Gen. Garfield sent a message to Mr. William Black in regard to his story, "MacLeod of Dare," regretting that the novelist had made it end so tragically. "There is tragedy enough in the world," he said, little thinking that in a few weeks he himself was to contribute still more.

Ex-Senator Gordon of Georgia has made a great fortune in railroading since he retired from the senate, two or three years ago, because he was too poor to stay. He now thinks he could afford to be a senator again, and, as political competition is too active in Georgia to give him much prospect of success there, he has transferred his residence to Florida, and is understood to have his eye upon Senator Call's place. The latter's term expires in 1885.

Miss Florence A. Smith, a Philadelphia belle, is to be married, on the 28th, to Baron Gisbert von Friesen, a young German nobleman, who owns two castles on the Rhine, to one of which he will transfer his bride after their marriage. The baron holds the position of chamberlain to the duke of Oldenburg. Miss Smith is the third Philadelphia girl who has married a German nobleman.

Hon. John C. Knox of Philadelphia, who was the Democrat leader in the Pennsylvania legislature of 1846 and in 1853, and was elected supreme judge by 40,000 majority, is passing the evening of his life in the insane asylum at Harrisburg, where he has been since 1877. Says the Philadelphia Times, "He was one of the most accomplished and genial men, and the evening of his once useful and promising life is unspeakably sad."

Lord Coleridge, who has promised to visit this country next fall as the guest of the bar, has consented to preside at the dinner to be given to Henry Irving before his departure to play here. A similar complimentary banquet was given to the comedian Toole, on his visit, at which the Earl of Rosebery presided. The dinners given to Thackeray on the eve of his first visit to the United States some thirty years ago, and to Dickens at St. George Hall, Liverpool, in 1869, when his health was proposed by Lord Dufferin in a speech rivalling in eloquence and grace that of Lord Lytton at the London banquet, will be long held in remembrance.

Frank Rand is probably the most conspicuous of the fifty-six men doomed to spend the rest of their lives in the Joliet Penitentiary. He is one of the worst men that ever lived and is as ugly as he is wicked. Rand works in the saddlery shop, in a corner where he is partially removed from the morbid gaze of visitors. He is a short, thick set fellow, with a low forehead, a pug nose and dark complexion. His hair is black, and his eyes, deeply set, give him the appearance of a human bulldog. Rand killed six men in Knox County, Ill., one in Warren County and his eighth victim was killed in St. Louis. Rand is said to be an arrant coward and was never known to be engaged in a fair fight, but shot his men down unawares.

Before General McClellan left Fortress Monroe, where he had been spending some time, last week, the veterans of the Hampton Home presented him with a large banner of royal purple satin, edged with gold fringe. It bore on one side the national arms and the inscription: "The National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, March 3, 1885. The Nation to her Defenders." The reverse bore these words: "Presented to General George B. McClellan, Local Manager, by Veterans of Southern Branch." The inscriptions were wrought in silk and gold thread embroidery, the work of the inmates of the home.

Eternal vigilance is the price of preventing an elopement when the young people are in dead earnest. An elderly uncle was lately observed in altercation with a young man and younger woman on the railroad station at Bodwin, England. He succeeded in detaining them until the train had gone, and then persuaded his niece to return with him to her home in Lostwithiel. The next train for that place was not due for two hours and uncle and niece went out for a walk. On their return to the station the old gentleman was so fatigued with the arduous labors of the day that he dropped sound asleep and when he awoke the lovers were beyond hope of recall.

A picturesque tale is told of Mr. Biggar, the home rule member of parliament who has just been compelled to pay $2,000 for the privilege of not marrying Miss Fanny Hyland. When he was standing for Cavan, in 1874, he was a member of the Presbyterian church, but, wishing to win the support of a Roman Catholic bishop on the subject of denominational education, he begged a friend to acquaint the prelate with the fact that he had both of his children at Catholic schools. "Why," remarked his friend, "I thought you were not married!" "No more I am," replied Mr. Biggar, "and to show you I am no bigot both of their mothers are Catholics."

At Minneapolis the republicans elected their candidate for judge and seven of the ten aldermen. The election of seven republican aldermen gives the republicans majority in the council. The parties are divided as follows: Republicans—Comstock, Andrews, Johnson, Coe, Cleveland, Greenleaf, Pillsbury, Clark, Parker, Haugan, Roberts, Lawrence, Channel—13 Democrats—Glenn Nelson, Waitt, Eichhorn, Hashow, Morse, Walsh, Holscher, Noeremberg, 9. The general belief is that as now constituted the council will be favorable to high license when the question shall be raised. The park scheme was adopted by a fair majority.

The war department occasionally receives petitions for the discharge of Sergt. Mason but nothing has yet been done about it, and the president, so far as can be learned, has taken no steps toward the exercise of executive clemency to relieve him from the eight year's imprisonment.

The Mississippi legislature defeated a proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquors, and adopted a bill providing biennial elections of state officers and meetings of the legislature.

The census report repeats the singular fact that forest fires are more destructive than the axe to the woodlands. In 1880, upward of 600,000 acres in Pennsylvania alone was reported as burned over, involving a loss of about $3,000,000.

There is a remarkable falling off in immigration to Manitoba this year from the last, when much suffering was occasioned by insufficient preparations for living in what was then an inhospitable country. But the province is gradually filling up and with the advance of railroads and other improvements it is destined to be popular and prosperous.

Winter wheat is not looking so well this spring as last, and reports indicate a considerable prospective falling off in the yield. The last crop was the best ever grown and a falling off of even 20 per cent.—the highest estimate—will still leave a fair crop. But the forthcoming crop depends upon so many conditions that present estimates are purely conjectural. Only one thing seems certain—taking into account the bad reports from California—that no one expects so large a crop as last year.

The electric motor for street railways is likely to prove successful. The recent experiments are very encouraging, and it is likely to work a revolution in methods of transportation upon iron or steel rails where the weight to be carried is limited to a few tons. It is simple in construction, completely under control, and costs but little money. Horse power is slow and expensive, and steam is impracticable on many accounts, some under very favorable circumstances, where the roads are level and there is not much travel.

The financial outlook is brightening with the advancing season and fewer prognostications of evil are heard from respectable financial sources. Business men seem to have settled into the belief that clouds which disturbed many people are in a great measure dispelled and that good times will continue until other disturbing causes arise. Apprehensions of stagnation if not positive revulsion have been of great service. They have operated as storms signals and prevented people from getting to far out on the sea of speculation.

A railroad conductor in Massachusetts has been found guilty of manslaughter for having caused a collision of two trains in which three persons were killed. It was shown that he had disobeyed orders and instructions, and thereby brought on the accident. The defence was that his mind was injuriously affected by malarial disease, and he was thereby rendered irresponsible. The conductor had enjoyed the reputation of a very trustworthy man. The Massachusetts jury which found him guilty was evidently determined not to let this fatal accident pass with the accustomed verdict, "Nobody to blame."

President Arthur still refuses to pardon Sergeant Mason, who attempted to kill Guiteau. He takes a different view of the magnitude of Mason's offence from that entertained by some two hundred thousand petitions for executive clemency in this case, and regards it one of very heinous character. Sergeant Mason was placed at the jail for the special purpose of protecting Guiteau from popular fury and betrayed his trust. Instead of protecting Guiteau he was the first to attempt to kill the assassin. Had he succeeded the salutary effect of Guiteau's trial, condemnation and execution would have been lost. There is force in these reasons for withholding a pardon for some time longer.

The Des Moines Register speaking of the unusually cruel and fatal work of pneumonia all over America the past winter, says that the death-rate and ill-rate from pneumonia in Iowa are very marked—the weather, even at the time of writing being unusually cold and raw People should be cautious in regard to clothing against such inclemency and peril, and in not unnecessarily exposing themselves to it. As it is the time of year when so many people—young people especially—take off underclothing, when it is the time of year of all others that they most need it—warning against the prevailing stress of hard weather is now timely. There are more deaths in March than in any other month, and greater care is necessary in that month and the early part of April than in any other to avoid lung and bronchial diseases.

One day last week a railroad man in Chicago estimated that more than 1000 cars were on the way to Dakota, Nebraska and Kansas, loaded with household goods, chattels, implements and effects of those emigrating to some promised land. The great tide of emigration seems to be setting more strongly towards Dakota than towards any other section. It is said that this craze to seek new homes in one of the new states or territories is not confined to any state or locality, but Ohio probably contributes more than all the New England states combined, and in Illinois and Wisconsin colonies are forming to go out and locate whole townships. If such an exodus is noticeable at this season of the year among our own people, what a rush there will be later on in the spring, when the flood-gates of the European countries are opened, and we begin to feel the full force of the tide of foreign immigration!

The Nebraska legislature has just passed a bill providing that one of the two assistant physicians of the state asylum for the insane shall be a woman. They hold their terms for six years.

Sergeant Boston Corbett, the man who killed the assassin of President Lincoln, is living in Kansas, engaged in the cattle business.

Gossip from Washington.

Secretary Teller received a letter dated March 27 from General George Crook giving further particulars regarding the situation in Arizona. Gen. Crook says the trouble is caused now by the Chiricahaus, the band of Indians who since 1874 have killed about 1,000 settlers and miners in Arizona. They are a different band of Indians from those on the San Carlos reservation, although the sins of the Chiricahaus have been often attributed to the Carlos Indians. The Carlos Indians are now behaving well, and are disposed to co-operate with the government against the hostilities. The Chiricahaus have never been subjugated, and the difficulties of a campaign against these Indians in the broken country of southern Arizona will be very great.

Information has been received at the Indiad office to the effect that parties are on Pine Ridge reservation endeavoring to entice some of the Sioux Indians to leave the reservation and join a circus. Indian Commissioner Price telegraphed Agent McGillicuddy that no one had a right to take the Indians off the reservation, and he was instructed to use all peaceable means to prevent the parties from doing so.

Special postal service discontinued: Arctic Dak. from April 30: Carrington, Dak., from April 30; Newport and Pingree, Dak., from April 30. Postmasters commissioned: Henry Neil, Meng, Dak., Christ T. Hallum, Norman., Dak.; John S. Rocheford, Rocheford, Dak.; H. E. Bruflat, Scandinavia: Thomas I. Williams, Barnewall, Wis.; William M. Crapsey, Wotrt, Iowa.

The treasury department rules that the provisions of the new tariff act amending section 2510 of the revised statutes took effect from the date of passage. This section provides for the free importation of shipbuilding material to be used in the construction of vessels built in the United State, for foreign account.

The funeral of the late Gen. Joseph K. Barnes, ex-surgeon general, took place in Washington Saturday afternoon with military honors. The escort consisted of a battery of the United States artillery, two companies of heavy artillery, two companies of United States marines and the Union Veteran corps.

It is estimated that under the new law reducing letter postage and regulating postmasters' salaries, the receipts of not more than one office in every four, on a general average, will be in excess of the postmasters' salaries. Under the existing law all postoffices, however insignificant, contribute two-fifths of their receipts to the government.

The seed department of the agricultural bureau is at a low ebb. During the past two or three months the drain has been so great and constant for seeds from all sections of the country that now but a light granary of garden and flower seeds remains on hand. New selections and a new store will be made in the fall.

Hereafter delinquent special taxes due the internal revenue bureau will be collected in money and a receipt given, instead of by selling past due stamps for the amount

Rail and River News.

The full particulars of the agreement recently arrived at between the four great trunk lines of the northwest, and upon which depended the location of the Northern Pacific railroad depot, have not as yet been given to the public. The main point made, however, is said to be an understanding between the Northern Pacific and the Manitoba on the one side, and the Milwaukee and Northwestern on the other, that none of these systems would invade the territory of the other, but permit things to remain as they are, and by doing so make St. Paul the great interchange point of the northwest, as Chicago is of the different lines entering in that city.

Land Commissioner Lamborn, of the Northern Pacific, states that he has received information which led him to believe that the great land sale, which has been talked about so much for some time past, would become a fact within sixty days. The sale contemplated is said to be of about 3,000,000 acres are now owned by the Northern Pacific, and lying east of the Missouri in Dakota and partially in Minnesota. The parties buying are represented by a syndicate composed of English and Boston parties, who pay for it in preferred stock.

The Canadian Pacific railway syndicate has completed arrangements to take over the Thunder Bay branch of the Canadian Pacific railway on May 1 instead of July 1 up to which latter date it will be claimed by contractors. The syndicate at once despatched a large force of men to put the entire line from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg in first-class order, and new passenger coaches, including sleepers and dining cars, are being constructed.

The work of extending the Northern Pacific railroad eastward from Superior to Ashland may be said to have commenced. The time for receiving bids for doing the grading will expire on the 18th of April, and the work will commence about the 1st of May, and the road be ready for business by the close of lake navigation, when Superior City will have direct communication with Chicago.

There are employed in the lumber and log towing business between St. Louis and Stillwater seventy-five boats, employing in the aggregate about 1,600 men, moving to market over 1,000,000,000 feet of logs and lumber, and paying out for wages, fuel, provisions, etc., considerable over 1,000,000 annually.

The Grand Forks News gives publicity to a rumor that Mr. Hill has decided to extend his road to Creel City at once, and adds that this action secures for the town at the head of Creel bay the land office and the county seat of Ramsey county.

The superintendent of motive power of the Northern Pacific road has been experimenting with the coal found out in the Northern Pacific country, and finds that it will work splendidly with the locomotives.

Summary of General News.

The Northwestern Miller says it is doubtful whether there was ever a duller time in the history of milling in Minneapolis than now. A similar condition of affairs exists in the country mills that are dependent on any trade save a local one. Only five mills are running, and two of these are making one-half their usual amount. The daily product is therefore about 5,000, and during last week it was no more than 2,000 or 3,000 barrels. The prospect is that this condition of affairs will continue for the next three weeks. The amount of wheat in store in the elevators has diminished from 1,723,000 bushels to 1,587,000 bushels.

At Austin, Tex., George Whitfort cowhided S. S. Smith, an aged minister, because he had written a criticism against a political article Whitfort wrote to a Northern journal to the effect that Texans outraged women and killed their husbands or male relatives for interfering and no jury would convict. Smith had Whitfort arrested. Whitfort is an employe of the American Tract society.

The Chicago Socialists have been restrained by an injunction from erecting a building on the lake front of that city under a grant voted by the city council. This was asked by owners of property facing on the lake front park, on the theory that the city had no authority over the tract. The Socialists had laid the foundation for a large assembly building.

The claimants to property found on the premises where William Haverstice and Mrs. Uhler lived in New York have concluded to settle their differences without litigation. Mr. Havestick's heirs, take half the $550 in money and Mrs. Uhler takes the other half, with the furniture.

The famous Porter Rifles of Nashville, who have barely kept together since their defeat at Indianapolis last July, are about to disband. Should they do so the celebrated Chickasaw Guards will have but one rival in the South, the Crescent Rifles of New Orleans.

The assignee of the suspended banking firm of C. H. Coy & Co., Toledo, which failed Monday, states the assets to be $123,000, liabilities $291,000; liabilities over assets $18,000.

Crimes and Criminals.

On the 28th. ult. Mrs. Hannah B. Sunderland, of Paterson, N. J., was found by her neighbors dying in bed with her hands tied and breathing heavily. She had a wound on her head as if made by an ax. She remained unconscious to the last, and died Thursday morning. Suspicion rested upon a negro who had been seen near her place and he was tracked to Danbury, Conn., and arrested there. Strange to say he had taken his ax with him, and spots of blood were found upon the handle. He was placed in jail, charged by the coroner's jury with willful murder.

Sergeant S. Willis, colored, and a private named Boyd, of Company E. at Fort Hale, Dakota, got into an altercation recently. Willis got the best of Boyd in the skirmish, but immediately thereafter Boyd went to the barracks, got his Winchester, put a forty-five cartridge into the same, walked to within thirty feet of Willis and fired, the ball passing into his left side just above the hip and coming out below the third rib on the right side. Willis fell, but regained his feet and walked to his barrack and reached for his gun. At that moment he fell dead.

James Robinson, aged seventy-six, was recently married in Buffalo, N. Y., to a Toronto lady, through an advertisement and by giving her a bogus check for $100,000. He decamped to Canada, taking with him a $75 gold-headed cane and overcoat, the property of Rev. Dr. Stratton, who performed the ceremony. Robinson was arrested at Hamilton, Canada.

The Italian murderer, Cornetti of White Plains, N. Y., has been resentenced to be hanged May 11. On the way back to his cell, he took off his hat, bid the sheriff good-by, and made a spring to escape. He was caught by the sheriff and his assistant and carried to the cell, fighting like a tiger.

The town of Sparta, Wis., is in tears over the loss of $13,000 and the good name of its best citizens, D. N. Cargill, town treasurer, who is a defaulter to that amount. He is a produce merchant, and speculated unprofitably with the money. The matter was known before his recent re-election.

Williston, Knight & Co., of New York fail with the same old story of a defalcation. The son of one of the partners squandered $75,000 of the firm's money in speculation. The firm has $400,000 capital and will compromise.

Ansell Arnold & Co.'s wholesale flour and feed store at Willimantic, Conn., was entered recently. The safe blown open and robbed of a small amount of money and $25,000 to $30,000 in bonds, which are not negotiable.

The body of Joseph Parisien, who has been missing for three weeks, and who was supposed to have been robbed and murdered, was found in a snow drift near Winnipeg yesterday. Foul play is suspected.

David C. Bliss, known to the police as "The Doctor," who abstracted $35,000 worth of bonds from a safe in the office of E. B. Treat, New York, publisher, was arrested a few days ago.

A. F. Crawford, deputy United States marshal under Longstreet, arrested at Atlanta, Ga., on a charge of making false and fraudulent returns, has escaped from the officers.

George W. Davids, who killed himself in New York, was acting treasurer of the board of education at New Rochelle, N. Y., and had custody of $30,000 town funds.

H. M. Carr, of Louisville, Ky., has been practicing as attorney before the interior department for having charged illegal fees in pension cases.

George W. Davids, of Thaddeus Davids & Co., ink manufacturers, New York, killed himself in the Grand Union hotel recently.

A respectable Richmond girl has kicked up a sensation by eloping with the handsomest negro in the city.

The Casualty and Fire Record.

The Western Union telegraph office, Roane's drug store, Masonic hall and several dwellings and small buildings were burned at Shelbyville, Tenn., Loss, $100,000; insurance, $50,000.

Charles McIntosh of Troy, N. Y., has gone to the insane asylum because he was jilted by a $200,000 heiress.

At Preston, Conn., W. K. Shaw's woolen mill. Loss, $30,000; insurance, $15,000.

Personal Mention.

Chicago Special: Ex-Senator Windom does not appear to be very much discouraged over the failure of his New York Stock exchange project. Within the last week the exchange has collapsed, and there is nothing left to represent it but a lot of beautiful circulars. Windom's present scheme is the development of the Tapolobampo railway. This ambitious enterprise is still on paper. Boston and New York capitalists have signified their willingness to take a large amount of the stock, trusting to opportunities and fine advertisements to put it off on the public at a sharp advance.

Barnum, being acquitted in New York of the charge of cruelty to children, in having the Elliott family perform, offered $200 a week to Jenkins, superintendent of the society for the prevention of cruelty to children, if he would permit him to exhibit him (Jenkins) through the country as a man who would prevent children from making an honest living.

The wife of Sergt. Mason writes from Locust grove, Orange county, Va., repudiating J. G. Bigelow, the lawyer, who is trying to get hold of the "Betty and the Baby" fund. She says he is not authorized to act for her, and has never done good for her husband.

At the New York East Methodist Episcopal conference, Rev. Nelson, of the Northwest Swedish conference, spoke of a school of Swedish students in the Northwest, and urged the importance of reaching 1,000,000 of Swedes now in the country.

James P. Stowe died at Meriden, Conn., recently. In 1868 he was chairman of the Alabama delegation to the Republican National convention, and his was the first vote ever cast for General Grant for candidate for president.

Rev. B. F. Cocker, author of numerous works on moral science, and who held the chair of professor of moral science in Ann Arbor university, died recently of nervous prostration.

Ex-Gov. Churchill of Arkansas recently thrashed Ex-Gov. Miller, of the same state, at a legislative hearing. Miller told Churchill he had defaulted while state treasurer.

Ex-Congressman Jay Hubbell, who is on the Pacific coast, is settling up his dead brother's estate. He will go into private business and never again enter politics.

John Winans, the democrat who beat Charlie Williams for congress in the First Wisconsin district, was married recently to Miss Fannie Russell of Antwerp, N. Y.

George F. Kyle, fourteen, and Lizzie Hollingshead, thirteen, were married with consent of parents at Covington, Ky.

Senator Bayard will deliver the address at the Yale law school commencement.

Foreign News Summary.

London Cable: The belief among the police is that the explosion at Westminster was designed to be a practical demonstration to the members of the dynamite conspiracy of the east, and safety to themselves with which they could act. They are convinced that the intention was to blow up a large number of public structures simultaneously at night, and to procure, at all hazards, an explosion about some part of Windsor castle. It is also intimated that it was designed to reach the members of the government. The information of the police upon all of these points appears to have been singularly accurate.

Carmody, O'Hearlihy and Featherstone the men arrested on a charge of being dynamite carriers, had a re-examination at Cork, conducted with the utmost privacy. They were further remanded for a week and bail refused. Featherstone created some sensation by declaring that, as for himself, he was a citizen of the United States, that he had placed himself and his case in the hands of the United States consul, and expected through that official redress for the indignity heaped upon him.

It is stated that the Hawaiian law prohibiting the direct importation of Chinamen from Hong Kong to Honolulu, has been repealed, and preparations are being made for the Hawaiian islands. The regular steamer Oceanic on its next voyage will go to Honolulu direct from Hong Kong before reaching San Francisco, and carry nearly 1,000 Chinese laborers. Over 3,000 have contracted for passage, and the next five steamers will take them to the islands.

The trial of the persons charged with the Phœnix park murders and other crimes, which was expected to begin on the 10th inst, will be postponed for a few days, owing to the fact that sufficient funds have not been raised for the conduct of the defense of the prisoners. It is the intention of the accused men, when asked on arraignment if they are ready for trial, to request that they be furnished with counsel. The trials, it is said, will be delayed until their counsel are instructed.

The National theater in Berlin was completely burned a few days ago with all its contents, including wardrobe, theater properties and scenery. There was no loss of life and no injury. The damage to surrounding buildings is comparatively small When the engines arrived, the flames had spread to the auditorium. The iron curtain separating the stage from the auditorium was not proof against the heat, and the proscenium boxes quickly ignited. The royal box was the first to catch fire.

London Cable: The outrage offered to Lady Harcourt by sending her by mail a piece of the sheet upon which a woman had died of small-pox, has aroused the deepest horror and indignation. Perhaps the leader of the dynamite party and his followers will make haste to assume the credit of this new form of warfare.

Jose Leandro Pearea, a political autocrat of New Mexico, was buried at Bernatillo. His was one of the wealthiest and most influential Mexican families in the Territory, representing, with his sons $5,000,000. The family for fifteen years has controlled Territorial elections. The funeral was grand.

Seven hundred and fifty Hungarian emigrants have arrived at Vienna. From Panchova 2,000 more men are en route and the whole Hungarian colony at Bukowina, numbering about 20,000, is determined to leave the place, owing to insufficiency of corps to feed the population.

The magistrate at Ennis, Ireland, Clifford Lloyd, and a strong force of police made a raid in the Crusheen district and arrested eight young men. The charge preferred against the prisoners is conspiracy to murder. More arrests on the same charge are expected.

Dr. D. P. Robinson of Erie, Pa., has renounced Christianity, publicly, and the Ancient Order of Workmen will put him on trial for violating their constitution, which requires every member to believe in God.

Bismarck, replying to a letter of congratulation from the crown prince, on the occasion of the chancellor's birthday, declared he intended to devote the remainder of his life to the consolidation of the finances of the empire.

A conflagration at Vallorbes, in Canton of Vaud, Switzerland, destroyed 145 houses, together with the postoffice, in which important securities were deposited. Twelve hundred persons are made homeless.

A letter from Michael Davitt is published in which he further expressed his opposition to the dynamite policy on the part of Irishmen. He declares that such a policy is insane, idiotic and criminal.

The emperor William, who usually commutes sentences of death, has decided not to interfere in the case of Conrad, who killed his wife and four children.

Germany and Spain have come to final agreement in regard to the conclusion of a treaty of commerce. Each made concessions.

The trial of the Phœnix park murderers will begin soon.

The Princess Louise is expected at Ottawa about the 20th.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Revised Regulations.

Washington, Special Telegram, April 5.—The commissioner of the general land office has promulgated the following revised regulations regarding soldiers' and sailors' additional homestead entries:

First—The party desiring to make an additional entry and being entitled thereto must present himself at the land office of the district in which the land he wishes to enter is situated, and make his application in the same manner as in case of an original entry.

Second—In addition to the usual homestead affidavit the claimant must make a special affidavit showing, first, his identity as the soldier he represents himself to be, reciting his military service and stating his present residence and postoffice address; second, the facts in detail respecting his right to make the additional entry and that he has fully complied with all the provisions of the homestead laws in the matter of residence upon and cultivation and improvement of his original entry, and whether or not he has proved up his claim and received a patent for the land; third, that he has not in any manner previously exercised his additional right either by entry or application, or by sale, transfer, or power of attorney, but that the same remains to him unimpaired.

Third—The foregoing affidavits must be sworn to and subscribed in the presence of the register and receiver. This rule must be strictly adhered to. In order to avoid false personation the applications and affidavits presented to the register and receiver with signatures attached will not be received. Department circulars of May 7, 1877, and Sept. 1, 1879, are modified accordingly.

A Boston woman has just completed a $20,000 mansion entirely on the proceeds from the sale of doughnuts.

English Alarm Over the Dynamite Business.

Jennings' London Cable troops have been sent forward to Birmingham to guard against the rescue of the Fenian prisoners there, but I may say that the class in England which is at present in the most imminent danger is the Irish population of London and our large manufacturing cities. Should any lives be lost by another dynamite explosion it is not too much to say that a literal war of extermination would probably be waged and the Irish driven out of every town. Already I notice that employers are afraid to take them, and a movement for their discharge is going on steadily in many large factories, so that the blow of the next explosion will be certain to fall more heavily on the Irishmen than any other class. I may add that the general opinion here is that the first serious disaster brought about by the skirmishers or avengers will settle the Irish question for the next fifty years in a sense adverse to the people of the sister island.

Nothing that could with propriety be called a panic exists in the public mind here respecting the discoveries that have been made of plots and dynamite factories during the week, but I have the best authority for saying that great uneasiness is felt in official quarters, where many important facts are known that for the present are of a necessity kept a secret. It is certain that a wide spread organization for the destruction of public buildings exists, and that as yet only its subordinate agents have been arrested or racked, and the government officials are aware of the existence in London and the other cities of the kingdom of large masses of explosives, all definite trace of which, however, they have temporarily lost. I need hardly say that much sorrow is felt at the fact that all these operations are carried on by means of money which is openly collected in the United States for the purpose. That these agents should be allowed to pursue their operations without let or hindrance by the American government, is regarded as an unfriendly act which the United States would not tolerate in its own case from another nation. I have reason to believe that this settlement will, in all likelihood, find a vigorous expression next week in the house of commons.

Death of Ex-Surgeon General J. K. Barnes.

Retired Surgeon General J. K. Barnes died at his residence in Washington on the 5th inst. He passed quietly away, surrounded by his family and a number of friends. Although affected for more than a year with disease of the kidneys, he was confined to his bed for only a short time. His death was, therefore, not wholly unexpected. He was sixty-six years of age, of commanding figure and courteous manner, and universally beloved and respected.

The troops at the arsenal, the Marine band and the marines at the navy yard were acted as militia. The following officers were pall-bearers: Gen. W. T. Sherman, Edmund Schriver, D. H. Rucker; W. H. Emory, A. Baird, M. C. Meigs, R. C. Drum, R. Macfeely, N. W. Brown, J. H. Crane, C. M. Wilcox and Joseph E. Johnson.

Gen. Barnes was born in Philadelphia, July 21, 1817. He received his degree of M. D. from the medical department of the university of Pennsylvania, being of the class of 1837-38. He practiced in the hospitals of that city, and as physician to the outdoor poor until June 15, 1840, when he was appointed an assistant surgeon in the army. He served with distinction in the Florida war, in the Mexican war, and in the civil war.

During the troublous times of the late war he earned the unbounded confidence of the secretary of war, Mr. Stanton, and held it unshaken to the last. At the time of the assassination of President Lincoln and attempted assassination of Secretary Seward, he attended at the death bed of the one and ministered with untiring energy and skill to the surgical recreation of the other. So during the long illness of President Garfield, he was one of the distinguished surgeons of the land who for days and nights served with devoted duty in the sick chamber of the president.

Postmaster General Gresham.

Judge Gresham, the new postmaster general, was born in Harrison county, Ind., in 1823. He was educated in his native state, and after graduating at the Indiana State university in Bloomington, he studied law and afterwards began practice at Corydon, the county seat of Harrison county. He was from the first, successful as a lawyer, and took an active part in the politics of the state. Shortly before the outbreak of the late civil war, he was elected representative in the legislature, and in 1861 he was chairman of the house committee on military affairs. While occupying this position, he co-operated so faithfully and energetically with Gov. Morton in the organization of state militia and raising and forwarding troops that the latter, on the 18th of September, 1861, commissioned him lieutenant colonel of the thirty-eighth regiment, Indiana volunteers. On the 20th of March, 1862, he was promoted to be colonel of the Fifty-third Indiana, and on the 11th of August, 1863, to be brigadier general of, volunteers. He participated in the siege of Corinth, the siege and capture of Vicksburg, and siege of Jackson, Miss., and up to the 8th of January, 1864, commanded the Third brigade, Fourth division of the Seventeenth army corps. He was brevetted major general for distinguished gallantry, and after January, 1864, commanded the Fourth division of the Seventeenth corps, until July of the same year, when he was severely wounded in the action before Atlanta. He was mustered out of service on the 30th of April, 1866, and as soon as his health and strength were fully restored he entered into partnership with Judge Butler, of New Albany, Ind., and resumed the practice of law in that city. In 1869 President Grant appointed Mr. Gresham district judge for the district of Indiana. This position he still holds.

The Very Elect Deceived.

At the session of the Methodist conference at New York, recently, Rev. Dr. Buckley, of the Christian Advocate, warned the members against confidence men, as two of the brothers had already been deceived by these sharpers. "The scoundrels," Dr. Buckley said, "have been lying wait for ministers connected with the concern, and robbed them as they were going up or coming down stairs. I accidentally came upon a minister in the clutches of a confidence man. The minister was just about to sign a check for $175. The confidence man represented himself as a brother-in-law of a well-known presiding elder. Some of the confidence men have been trying to work their little games with ministers in front of this very church this morning."

Agricultural Department Statistics.

Mr. J. R. Dodge, Statistician of the Agricultural Department, in his report lately published, concludes that no country in the world has such excellent agricultural machinery as the United States; hence we import no goods of that sort, for those in use in England, France, Germany and other countries would be cumbersome and worthless here owing to the antiquity of their style and mechanism. The farm census in the report gives the aggregate value of the live-stock in the States and Territories as $200,338,147. The average value of horses is $70.59; of mules, $79.49; of milch cows, $30.21; of other cattle, $21.80 of sheep, $2.53; of swine, $0.75. These figures show an increase of $12.07 on horses, $3.14 on mules, $4.32 on milch cows and $1.20 on swine during the year.

Real estate sales in Minneapolis the past week aggregated $561,980.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

State Agricultural Statistics.

The following information about the agricultural prospects of the state is furnished by the statistical agent of the national agricultural department: The cultivated area will be increased by the addition of 7 1-2 per cent. or 350,000 acres of new land. There will be a reduction of about 2 per cent. in the acreage devoted to wheat, and an addition of 16 1-2 per cent. to that of oats, of 15 per cent. to that of corn, 5 per cent. to that of rye, 6 per cent. to that of barley and 8 per cent. to that of potatoes. These estimates are of course based on the presumption that we are to have a reasonably propitious season for seeding. On account of the difficulty of procuring clean seed, there will be a heavy falling off in the number of acres devoted to flax this season. The condition of stock generally continues to be fully up to the average, notwithstanding the unusual severity of the weather. Horses have suffered in a few localities from pinkeye, glanders and a kind of nervous disease which is called by some paralysis, and by others spinal meningitis. Hog cholera is reported as prevailing in a few counties, but not to any considerable extent; supposed to result from feeding unsound corn. There has been quite a heavy loss of young pigs, owing to the extreme cold weather in February and March, where they were not sufficiently sheltered. Neat cattle and sheep have thriven even better than usual. The average prices of grain for the state at large are as follows, viz. No. 1 wheat, 95½c; corn, 46c; oats, 37c, rye, 55c; barley, 50c; potatoes, 48c. The amount of wheat yet remaining in the hands of farmers is estimated to be about one-sixth of the crop, exclusive of that used for food and seed. Contracts are made for labor at from $15 to $20 per month, board and washing included, for the entire year, and $20 to $25 for the working season. In one county the extreme is as low as $13 per month, and in one instance the highest quotation is $30 per month. The following counties report positive deficiency of help: Benton, Le Sueur, Renville, Winona, Rock, Rice, Pipestone, Kanabec, Goodhue and Blue Earth. In the following it is thought the supply of laborers will not be equal to the demand: Steele, Houston, Dodge, Pope, Yellow Medicine, Crow Wing, Carver, Big Stone, Stearns, Todd, Traverse and Clay.

The New State Board of Correction and Charities.

Gov. Hubbard has recently appointed the following gentlemen members of the state board of correction and charities: A. H. Young, M. McG. Dana, H. R. Wells, E. T. Wilder, W. M. Campbell and Reuben Reynolds. Austin Hill Young, appointed for a term of three years' is a resident of Minneapolis, and is a native of Fredonia, Chautauqua county, N. Y. Mr. Young first emigrated to Wisconsin in 1854 and came from there to Minnesota in 1866, locating in Minneapolis. He is a lawyer by profession. In 1877 he was elected associate justice of the Fourth judicial district. Malcolm McG Dana, appointed for one year, is well known in St. Paul as the pastor of Plymouth Congregational church. Henry Rogers Wells, appointed for three years, is a resident of Preston, Fillmore county, and a native of Luzerne Warren county, N. Y. Mr. Wells came to Minnesota in 1857, settling first at Chatfield. He was judge of probate for Fillmore county for several terms. He is not practicing law. E. T. Wilder, appointed for one year, is an Ohio man, and for a number of years was a judge in the Ohio courts. He came to Red Wing in 1856 and practiced his profession until a few years ago, when he retired from all business. Judge Reuben Reynolds, appointed for two years, is a resident of Crookston, Polk county, moving there from Rochester some five or six years ago. He is an old settler of Olmsted county, having emigrated there in 1856. He is now practicing law. William M. Campbell, appointed for two years, is a resident of Litchfield, Meeker county, and a native of Pennsylvania. He came to Minnesota in 1853, and has, more or less, been identified with politics ever since. He was elected to the state senate in 1881.

Too Many Wives, Tar and Feathers.

Glencoe Register: They celebrated a supposed wedding out in the Getchell neighborhood on Monday morning last in a manner that the bridegroom, M. W. Heenan, must have thought was strikingly and painfully interesting, and if reports are reliable, the question now is whether Heenan has two wives or none. We understand that he claims to have got a divorce from the woman who lived with him as wife until within a few months, but the neighbors say he has not been able to exhibit the papers, and they know that the woman is now living in or at the neighborhood of Grand Forks. For several months Heenan has been cultivating very intimate relations with one of Mr. Zitloe's daughters against the protests of the family, and matters had become somewhat exciting previous to last Saturday, when Heenan and the girl, after being absent for a few days, returned to the neighborhood and took up their lodgings with John Abbot's family, claiming to have been married; the general belief however, was that they were not and could not be lawfully man and wife; so last Monday morning some fifteen or twenty young men of the neighborhood called upon Mr. Heenan, and report says they left him in a sorry plight; so changed in appearance that his best and nearest friends would hardly recognize him. The boys went prepared to do full justice to the occasion, and commenced the fun by polishing him off a la Heenan. After they had softened his hide sufficiently, they applied a well and scientifically prepared soothing plaster, made of tar and feathers, which they warranted to stick until the hair comes off.

School Laws and Text-Books.

The superintendent of public instruction has issued the following circular:

First—The law requiring at least four months of school to entitle a district to the annual apportionment will be in force after Sept. 1, 1883:

Second—Blanks for the county text-book agents' bonds have been issued. All other blanks will be issued during the coming week. Requisitions should be made promptly. District clerks may deposit their books at a depository and take a receipt from the agent upon a form provided. This receipt should be sent to the county treasurer, who will place the amount to the credit of the district and charge the same to the agent.

Third—The added transportation charges have been redistributed, so that the prices will be in fives and tens to facilitate the making change, as follows:

Fourth—The bill requiring that children be at least six years of age to be enrolled in the public schools did not pass, as has been supposed. It passed the senate, but was not returned from the house, and was never engrossed.

D. L. KIEHLE,
Superintendent Public Instruction.

Asa Hurd died at Chatfield, Fillmore county last Sunday night, April 1st. Mr. Hurd was in his ninety-first year, and was well-known throughout the state. He was born in New Hampshire and came to Minnesota in 1855, being the second settler to locate at Salem, Olmstead county. Eleven children were born unto him, and his wife, Mary Putnam, a direct descendant of Gen. Israel Putnam, of revolutionary fame. All of the children, seven daughters and five sons, are now living, except one of the latter, who was killed during the late war. Mr. Hurd lived to see four generations of his family. He was a remarkable old gentleman, and highly esteemed by those with whom he was brought in contact.

Minneapolis parties have shipped a steam saw-mill to Red Lake Falls, and have already purchased 2,000,000 feet of logs at that point. A fine three story hotel is to be erected in the village without delay.

The Hutchinson foundry will be moved to Litchfield, citizens of the latter place donating a site and a bonus of $2,000.

The State fair will be held at Owatonna this year.

Meranda Peterson of Dane Prairie and Inyer A. Winge of Aurdal have been adjudged insane and committed to the St. Peter asylum.

The school house at Maple Glen, near Shakopee, was burned. That it was set on fire by some malicious person there can be no doubt. Kerosene oil was thrown upon the ceiling and about the sides of the building. While the fire was burning about the roof, another fire was discovered in a little cupboard, plainly showing that the fire was incendiary in its origin.

Fergus Falls Journal, 5th; It is now announced that Capt. George W. Boyington has reconsiderad his decision to decline the land office registry, and will now qualify as soon as practicable. This decision will simplify matters as they stand at present, and probably prove a relief to Congressman Nelson.

Articles of incorporation of the Marine Mills Creamery association of Marine Mills, Washington county, have been filed with the secretary of state. The first board of directors and its officers are: Samuel Judd, president; Nels Thompson, vice president; George F. Sabin, secretary; John G. Rose, treasurer, and P. C. Pettigrew. The capital stock of the concern is $5,000, divided into 100 shares of $50 each.

George W. Boyington, recently appointed to succeed Soren Listoe as register in the land office, has positively declined the appointment. There will now be a second heat in the race for the office, with H. G. Stordock of Rothsay and John G. Nelson of Parker's Prairie as the most prominent candidates. Boyington will keep the register of deeds, and will be a candidate for re-election.

Charles Wilson, charged with committing burglary and larceny at Minneiska, and who was twice indicted by the grand jury last fall but escaped before he could be arrested, has been captured at Rochester by the sheriff of Olmsted county.

Redwood Falls has a sensation recently in the way of an old-fashion elopement. Two young and giddy things both under age, wanted to marry, but had to run away in order to accomplish it. The young lady was taken down a ladder from her chamber in the small hours of the night, and speeding away by team to Morton the runaways took the train from there to Glencoe, where they were married.

A fire was discovered in the old two-story frame building owned by Henry Klanke, on the corner of Main and Ferry streets, Le Sueur. The flames from the Klanke building soon spread to the small frame photograph gallery of F. M. Ingalls, and while licking that up the adjoining two-story frame building of Dr. Dodge, occupied as a residence and office, caught fire and was soon destroyed. The Klanke building was occupied on the ground floor by H. Stiebeling with a stock of boots and shoes, C. L. Klinke with a stock of jewelry, and J. P. Woods with a grocery store. The jewelry stock and groceries were nearly all removed, but the stock of boots and shoes was almost wholly destroyed.

Andrew Olson, after drinking hard at Mora, Kanabec county, March 31, started for home, and was not seen afterward until the next Sunday, when his body was found under the bridge over Ann river, he having been killed by falling while attempting to cross the structure.

At Albert Lea, recently, a boy named Frank Hardy, aged fourteen years, employed at the depot of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern and Minneapolis & St. Louis in this city as call boy, was run over by an engine and instantly killed while attempting to couple cars. A coroner's jury rendered a verdict according to the above facts. The father of the boy was killed in a railroad accident, and one brother was killed by train wreckers some time since.

Now it is said that George W. Boyington appointed register of the Fergus Falls land office to succeed Soren Listoe, will refuse the appointment because he cannot name his successor as county treasurer.

Frederickson, Hanson & Drummond have bought 42,000 acres of land near Jackson, upon which they will locate settlers as fast as may be.

Lymen Hollis, a prominent citizen of Luverne, died at that place recently of pheumonia.

Landscape gardening in artistic methods at St. Paul is to be a feature of spring improvements this year, and a number of the owners of handsome residences propose expending hundreds—in some instances thousands—of dollars in beautifying their lawns and yards. The terracing of such grounds as admit thereof will be made a speciality.

Seeding has begun in some of the dryer sections of the state.

New Anecdote of Greeley.

Shortly after the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment, a movement in which Mr. Greeley had taken considerable interest, a large darky, who had called several times at the Tribune office, came into Mr. Greeley's private room while he was busily engaged in writing. Now, if there was any one thing that was well understood around the Tribune office it was that Mr. Greeley was not to be interrupted in the midst of his thought. When he was seen to be busy, with his face down to his paper, and his pen running rapidly from left to right across the sheet, no one around the office had the hardihood to speak to him. But this colored gentleman marched straight up to his elbow, and with a large gold-headed cane under his arm, and a fine broadcloth coat buttoned close around his breast, he broke right in: "I say, Mr. Greeley, I thought I would call and talk with you, sah, about advising de cullud people to study de sciences." Mr. Greeley's face assumed a nearer proximity than ever to the paper he was writing on, and his hand kept going across it from left to right, with greater rapidity than before. The cheeky freedman was not to be put out of time in this way. He therefore spoke again, and in a slightly louder tone of voice than before: "I thought I would ask you," he continued, "to write an editorial advising the cullud people to study the sciences." Still the great editor wrote on. On the third repetition of the remark, Mr. Greeley, laid down his pen, and, looking up hastily, exclaimed: "Go away! Go to h—l Go over into New Jersey, and go to raising potatoes!" The colored man didn't trouble him any more.

The force of example was brought out in a juvenile prize fight in Shenandoah, Pa., Tuesday. The boys of the village had been reading of a slugging match in New York. and repairing to neighboring woods, two babies nine years old stripped to the waist and entered the ring formed by their companions. Four rounds were fought, when one youngster had his arm broken and the fight was declared off.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of one hundred and ninety-six 72/100 dollars, which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Thomas Lambert and Josephine Lambert, his wife, to Carl Kretzschmar, bearing date the 26th day of November, A. D. 1881, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 28th day of November, A. D. 1881, at 1:10 o'clock p. m., in book "B" of Mortgages, on page 553, to secure the payment of one certain promissory note, dated Nov. 26th, 1881, made by said Thomas Lambert and Josephine Lambert, whereby they promised to pay to the order of Carl Kretzschmar the sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars with interest at ten per cent. per annum until paid, payable one year after date, and no action or proceeding at law or otherwise having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: The northwest quarter (¼) of Section number twenty-four (24) in Township number one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-six (46), in Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, will be sold, at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House in the City of Crookston in said County and State, on the thirteenth day of April, A. D. 1883, at ten o'clock a. m. of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated February 27th, A. D. 1883.

SUBSTANTIAL

IMPROVEMENTS

IN AND ABOUT

CROOKSTON

SOME DETAILS ABOUT THE PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS ON

Sampson's Addition!

The Direct Benefits to Crookston Securd Through the Crookston

Improvement Company.

The people of Crookston, familiar with the plat of the city and the immediate vicinity, know at a glance the strip of ground directly across the river on the west, in the shape of a horse shoe, with the front part adjoining the business portion of the city of Crookston, and separated from it by the Red Lake River only. This land, some seventy or eighty acres, is surrounded on more than three sides by the river, lays high and dry, some of it over fifty feet above the river, is a natural forest with considerable valuable building timber and several thousand cords of wood, if cut down, and altogether a natural park, needing only some clearing up, and has a river frontage of over a mile and a half, and within three blocks of the post office and two blocks from the depot.

Any one familiar with the location and its exceedingly natural adaptability for residence and business, especially everything that comes under the head of manufacturing, will wonder why this has not been long ago improved and made a part of the city proper. The answer is simply because it has been isolated from the city, owing to the lack of bridge facilities whereby people from the west have been compelled to make a long detour to cross the wagon bridge east of the railroad track.

It remained for our townsman, Hon. Bernhard Sampson to solve the question and he has done it very practically, too, and in a manner that will prove very advantageous and beneficial to Crookston. Mr. Sampson is not much of a talker, but a hard and indefatigable worker, and not being in the State Legislature this past winter, he has been devoting his time to the crystalization of his plans, and these are now sufficiently advanced to justify the statement in detail.

First of all, Mr. Sampson interested some active and practical monied men from St. Paul, and the result was the formation of the "Crookston Improvement Company," of which Mr. Sampson is president. This company's capital is twenty-five thousand dollars, and are the proprietors of the property in question, which is being platted and known as 'Sampson's Addition to Crookston." The Crookston Improvement Company proposes to improve the property by clearing out superfluous timber, grade streets, and guarantees a bridge across the river at the foot of Robert street, by which the center or Sampson's addition will be brought within five minutes walk of the post office. Mr. Sampson vouches for the statement that the price of lots will be within the reach of all, especially of men with limited and stated incomes, and liberal inducements will be given to all who buy with a purpose to build. The locaton is particularly favorable for the large number of railroad men who make Crookston their homes. The next move was the organization by the same parties of a Flouring Mill Co., with fifty thousand dollars working capital. The mill, 250 barrels capacity a day, will be built this season, work already begun on Sampson's Addition, directly opposite the water power. A large foundry and machine shops, the main building 60x150 feet is also secured for the same location.

Negotiations are progressing favorably for a straw paper mill, also a sash, door and blind factory and planing mill, all to be located on Sampson's Addition. Arrangements are also completed, or agreed upon, by which the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad Co., will put in a spur track, at a point on the south side of the river, to run under the bank below Mr. Sampson's residence, and follow the south and west bank of the river to a point within a block of the west end of the bridge in Sampson's addition, to facilitate the movement of freight to and from the several mills, foundry and factories.

This is in brief the outline of what the Crookston Improvement Company has accomplished, and projected during its brief existence of hardly a month, and the prime mover in the entire project from its inception has been our friend Sampson. To carry out the improvements contemplated, involves an expenditure this season of over $100,000, a great part of which will be paid out for labor and material right here and which, when completed, will give permanent employment to upwards of a hundred mechanics and laborers.

The Crookston Improvement Company is also negotiating with parties to come here and build a barrel factory to whom liberal inducements are offered. They argue, and very correctly, that here at Crookston, where water power can be had at a nominal price and where the raw material is almost on the ground in great abundance, and cheap, is the right spot to plant a barrel factory, and it is estimated that the flouring mills within a radious of fifty miles of Crookston have even now a daily requirement of over five hundred barrels and being a railroad center, with roads north, south, east and west a barrel factory could supply the market promptly, and at a considerably less price than Minneapolis factories, as the saving in freight alone would be a very respectable item on the right side of the ledger.

The plat of Sampson's addition shows the liberal and broad gauge principle of the proprietors, in wide streets, and a very large number of lots having river frontage, and from 50 to 75 feet fronts by 150 and up to 250 feet deep. The order for lumber and other material for the flour mill has already been given, and timber for the foundation is now on the ground, and work will begin as soon as practicable.

Mr. Sampson and his associates believe in taking their own medicine and that in liberal doses, in inaugurating their substantial improvements instead of laying out a paper addition and "booming" it, pocketing the proceeds, we cannot but congratulate the people of Crookston on the good example set by the Crookston Improvement Company, and it is now in order for others to step up to the front and do likewise.

No lots have yet been offered for sale but we understand from Mr. Sampson, that plats will be ready for exhibition about the 15th, when prospective purchasers will be shown the handsomest and cheapest property ever offered in Crookston. Terms of payment will be made to suit the views of the purchasers who may wish to build.

We wish to say to any man not familiar with the geography of the Great Northwest, to procure a map of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad, follow its main line northwest from St. Paul, then let your eye rest on Crookston, the county seat of Polk County, Minnesota, in the heart of the famous Red River Valley. Please note the railway center of Crookston, north to St. Vincent and Winnipeg, south to St. Paul, east to Duluth, west to the Devil's Lake and Turtle Mountain country. Observe the source in Red Lake, to the east of the Red Lake River, passing through Crookston, giving direct communication with the limitless forests and pineries around Red Lake and towards Lake Superior to the east, and Lake of the Woods to the north, and see the branch line from Crookston to St. Hilaire, on its way to the Lake of the Woods. Examine the inexhaustible rich soil of Polk County of which Crookston is the geographical center, and then give some attention to our water power. Form an acquaintance with our enterprising and progressive people, and see if Crookston does not offer substantial inducements for your abilities and capital.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, APRIL 19

If this weather is not various it is nothing.

Will Trombly has returned very much improved in health.

The Addition is booming. Catch on to some of the chances.

260 lots in Jeromes Addition now offered. Make your selections.

A fine line of spring goods every day arriving at the Bankrupt store.

Angus was represented at the sale by Messrs. Brush, McLennon and others.

Mr. Isaac Webb and Mr. D. T. Herriott attended the auction sale on Tuesday.

Which is why Tom Batchford was "smiling" this week—boy—ten pounds, April 10th, 1883.

The finest plat of ground for residences in Jerome's Addition, good wells, cellars and shelter.

S. B. Simons, representing N. E. Solomen wines, liquors and cigars was in the city last week.

Lots on both of the new additions are going off like hot cakes. Catch on if you intend to get there.

John, the boomer, will make your wives and babies happy with a nice spot on the addition for a home.

Call at the bankrupt store and examine a full line of Gents' Furnishing Goods for spring and summer wear.

Geo. McLean has accepted a position in the post office and will soon be an adept in assorting Uncle Sam's mails.

Markham has the finest picture in town. It represents the seal skin cigar and everybody should gaze upon it.

Lots single, double, one-fourth blocks, one-half blocks for those whose nerve and judgment grasp the situation and lead them to fortune.

Euclid turned out en masse to the great stock sale. Among the prominent ones we noticed Messrs. Davidson, Foote, Johnson, Currie and many others. Rev. Mr. Currie secured a choice Jersey cow for $75.

Rev. Frank L. Sullivan of Moorhead will preach for the First Baptist church people Sunday next the 27th. Services as usual.

The river is clear of ice below the dam for a long distance. The prospects are that the ice will all go out with very little trouble.

A large chunk of ice, cord wood, and logs that threatened damage to the dam was successfully blown up and sent on its way in pieces on Thursday morning.

Berg & Olsen, the Robert Street jewelers are doing a fine business this spring. They have just received a fine line of clocks to which they invite especial attention.

We are requested to announce that vacation will be continued one week—until April 30th. Mr. Smith and Miss Millis have resigned and their places are to be filled.

The Bathgate Sentinel, under the management of R. D. Hoskins is received. Hoskins knows how to put the spice into a paper and we predict for him a brilliant future.

Mr. A. A. Olds has been papering and painting Xavier Cuillierrier's sample room and has it in fine shape. Mr. C. recently bought out C. P. Goudet and will keep a first-class sample room in every particular.

Seeding, which was about being commenced, received a set back on Friday last by a rain storm and Sunday saw a fine bit of snow. A slight delay only was caused and soon the festive seeder will be gaily humming in the land.

A large number of immigrants from Canada, about 40 families, arrived on Tuesday night. They are from the vicinity of Valleyfield, Prov Quebec and are a hardy, thrifty looking lot who will doubtless make very desirable citizens,

The Aitkin Age, published by E. F. Barrett, formerly the irrepressible agent of the St. Paul Globe is on our table. The Age is a bright, sparkling local paper and will do much good for that locality. Success to the Age. We gladly X.

It is said that the Banning sisters will favor Crookston with a visit soon "if a good house is guaranteed." The Banning sisters are good readers but they must take their chances like other entertainments for their guarantee of a good house.

The post office has been removed one door south of the Bankrupt Store and arranged far more conveniently than ever before. Each department has more room than formerly and the change is the money order department is a decided improvement.

A. E. Johnson, Mr. Bjornstad and Mr. Wilcken, of the Crookston Improvement Company, together with several wealthy gentlemen from Chicago spent the Sabbath in our city. The Chicago gentlemen caught on to several blocks on the addition and are to build several houses upon them.

Mr. Benj. Gervais recently killed a she bear, near his residence at Red Lake Falls which was a big monster. He had a sharp tussle but came out victorious killing the bear and capturing her two cubs alive. The cubs he offers for sale cheap to any one desiring that kind of a bird for a pet.

The horses, cows, hogs, machinery and household goods exposed at the great sale on Tuesday sold well on an average. The choice Jerseys would doubtless have commanded higher prices had they been in better condition. One fine two year old colt was drowned in Burnam's Creek en route to the sale

Georgie Foote, the little son of W. H. Foote, of Euclid, in attempting to get into a wagon fell and broke his left arm just below the elbow. As there was no surgeon handy W. H. set the broken limb which is now doing finely and the little fellow rejoices in the prospects of a speedy recovery.

Mr. H. L. Gaylord was up from Edna on Saturday last He says that he has done a little seeding on his Sand Hill River farm already. He was accompanied by his brother Mr. F. T. Gaylord, of Minneapolis who is on the lookout for chances for investment and will doubtless catch on to some Crookston dirt.

Amusements.

No end of amusements are promised for the near future, the Jolly Pathfinders will appear about the 24th of May; the Boston Ideal Uncle Lewis Cabin Company on the 27th; John Dillon on May 11th Miss Phosa McAllister in June, and Sol Smith Russell about June 11th.

Another Boom.

Jerome's Addition is at last on the market and now there will be a rush for the choice lots. This addition contains the finest desirable residence lots in the city, and we have lit down on one of them already. The proprietors advertise for sealed bids for the erection of a bridge across the river in this issue which shows they are in dead earnest.

Wait for It.

A. S. Capehart writes us from Fargo that he will be in Crookston on Tuesday, June 12th with the famous Sol Smith Russell and his splendid company who will appear before the Crookston people in "Edgewood Folks." Everybody wants to see Sol Smith Russell.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

[illegible] BUTLER.

How [illegible] Butler of South Carolina, One of the Most Distinguished Members of the United States Senate, Lost His Leg at Brandy Station.

Dr. T. B. Bessellieu, of the confederate service during the war, writes to the Philadelphia Times an account of the battle of Brandy Station in Virginia, where Senator Butler of South Carolina lost a leg. He says the enemy had advanced in such heavy force as to cause the detached squadrons of our single regiments to abandon the woods and take up position in the open, levelfields, where cavalry could manœuvre and we could keep our communication open with General Stuart, then fighting at Brandy Station, and cover the movements of a heavy infantry force then in the neighborhood of Culpepper court house. Along the margin of a pond, then, the regiment was posted, when the enemy appeared on the hill in our front before mentioned and placed their artillery near the brick church and opened fire upon us. We had no artillery to respond and the distance was too great for small arms, so we waited for developments. Colonel Butler and Captain Farley, of General Staurt's staff, were on the road a few rods distant from us, when the discharge of a field piece in our rear drew the attention of all in that direction. We saw that it was a Confederate gun, but too far from the enemy to be of any service, as the shells it discharged were exploding fully one hundred yards short of the enemy's position.

The Colonel told me to ride up the hill and tell the officer commanding that gun to bring it down to where we were, as his firing was doing no good. The enemy's batteries were now firing very fast, and I narrowly escaped being struck while galloping up the hill. I rode up to the lieutenant in charge of the gun, which I think belonged to a Virginia battery, and told him "Colonel Butler says bring your gun down to where the troops are stationed, as you are wasting your fire in your present position." He asked: "Who in the h—— is Colonel Butler?" I told him he was the colonel of the Second South Carolina Cavalry, in command of the troops then in view engaged with the enemy. He ordered the gun to be limbered up and started to descend the hill. I turned to ride back to my command when, what was my surprise to find our artillery friend had again put his piece "en battery" and had opened on the enemy's artillery. I returned to him again and repeated my order.

"Colonel Butler says bring your artillery down to the pond."

"D——d if I am going to carry my men there to be killed," said he.

"Very well, sir," I said, "I shall inform Colonel Butler of your remark," and galloped towards the spot where I left Colonel Butler and Captain Farley standing.

I rode parallel to the main road and within fifty yards of it for some little distance, and just before I reached the Colonel I saw quite a dust in the road and considerable excitement, and Colonel Butler's horse trotted by me with what I took to be the saddle hanging underhim. I hastened up to the road to get a better view and saw that the poor animal's intestines were hanging out from a fearful wound in the lower portion of the stomach. I knew then that some terrible disaster had occurred, so I leaped the fence into the road and quickly arrived at the scene. There lay both Colonel Butler and Captain Farley in the road, the former trying to tie a silk handkerchief around his leg to stop the blood. The shell, which was a small, conical-pointed Parrott, first struck Capthin Farley just above the knee, cutting off the leg and killing his horse, then striking Colonel Butler an inch above the ankle, leaving the foot suspended by a piece of skin only and disemboweling his horse.

Almost the same moment that I arrived Dr. Watt Taylor, our regimental surgeon, and Captain John Chesnutt reached the scene, and the doctor asked me to try and procure some stimulants immediately suggesting that if I could find Dr. Moore, our assistant surgeon, to bring him with me, as he had a canteen of whisky and Captain Farley was in need of his services immediately. Fortunately Dr. Moore was not far off, and we returned to the scene of the disaster without delay. My attention being given to assisting Dr. Taylor with Colonel Butler, who was already much prostrated from loss of blood, I lost sight of Captain Farley, who was taken in charge by Mr. Moore and conveyed towards Culpeper Court House, but died from exhaustion before reaching that place, as from the nature of his wound the hemorrhage could not be stemmed in time to save his life. After cutting away the boot from the Colonel's foot and applying a tourniquet at the knee to stop the bleeding, we kept the foot in position by splints made of bark from the rail fence by us, with bandages to keep them in place.

No ambulance could be found, and the enemy, seeing from the excitement that some one of consequence had been killed or wounded, concentrated all their fire upon our immediate locality, so it became necessary to remove Colonel Butler out of reach of this storm of shells. Four of us took him on a blanket and started. No one knows until they have tried it the fearful task of carrying a man in that way, on a hot June day, in the terrible dust of the battle-field, with the tramping of five hundred horses around—for almost at the moment we started a force of the enemy were reported to be crossing the road between us and Brandy Station, and threatening our flank and rear, and our whole force was got together to repel the danger. All was excitement and anxiety, and our chances of getting safely off with our burden seemed very slim. Colonel Butler said to us: "Don't let them take me, boys," and we all vowed we would die first.

Having traversed the whole length of the field with our burden we reached a piece of wood where the First South Carolina cavalry had formerly encamped, and there procured an old horse trough, or long box that had been used as such, into which we placed the colonel with the blankets tucked under him. We then cut two sticks sufficiently long to pass under and across the box and to afford protecting handles for us to hold by and resumed our way through the fields and woods by the shortest route towards Culpepper Court house. We finally reached a farmhouse, where it was determined that our colonel should remain till his wounded limb could be attended to, and as reaction had taken place, under the judicious administration of brandy, Dr. Taylor determined to lose no time in removing the foot and shattered bones, so as soon as the messenger dispatched to Culpepper for the chloroform returned, I was instructed by the doctor to administer the anæsthetic, the Colonel having been placed upon a suitable table for the purpose and all necessary articles being conveniently placed to facilitate the operation. After the surgical treatment had been satisfactorily gone through with Dr. Taylor requested me to remain with Colonel Butler till he awoke from sleep, so as to give nourishment and stimulants if necessary. He went away hurriedly to see our Lieutenant Colonel Frank Hampton, who had been mortally wounded [illegible]

[illegible] By [illegible] I could leave Colonel Butler, who had kind friends and competent nurses to look after him, and I then joined my command, which I found on the road beyond Stephensburg, having gallantly held the large force of the enemy in check all day, and followed their retreat nearly to the Rappahannock river.

Personal Intelligence.

"Cedarcroft," the residence of the late Bayard Taylor, is again offered for sale. At the sale after the owner's death it was bought by Silas Warner, of Montgomery county, who made it his home. Mr. Warner's wife has died, and as his home is now broken up the property is again in the market.

Prof. Swing, of Chicago, christened seven children of his congregation at his residence Easter afternoon. The water used had been brought from the River Jordan by the grandfather of one of the little ones, and the silver christening cup which held the precious drops was formerly the property of President Lincoln.

Just before State Treasurer Vincent of Alabama, absconded, he handed to his wife a package, which, upon opening, she found to contain $15,000 for her personal use. Concluding that it was the state's money, she turned every cent over to the proper authorities.

Mr. Vanderbilt, the head of the house, is said to make some people hold their breath when they see him drive. A man worth $200,000,000 and nearly sixty-five years old, driving himself at a weight of 230 pounds in a wagon weighing 184 pounds, at a rate of a mile in two minutes and a half, on a road crowded with fast teams, is thought by "Gath" to be "a pretty healthy, ruddy specimen of the richest citizens of the world."

Mr. John Peck, who died recently near Peducah, Ky., was the father of seven sons and daughters. Just before his decease he called his youngest son to his bedside and told him that he had saved $1,000 in gold for each of his children. He attempted to say where he had concealed it, but before he had finished the grim messenger appeared and cut short his story. A search for the hidden treasure discovered two jugs with the necks knocked off, in which Mr. Beck had been accustomed to drop his savings. One was concealed in the stable and the other in the smoke-house. Together they were found to contain $36,000 in gold. The rest cannot be found, though it is believed to be somewhere on the premises.

Joaquin Miller, in a letter to the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, says; "For my own part, when I die and wherever I die, wrap me in the sheet at once and burn my body instantly, and scatter my ashes on the hills. This is my only will, and I appoint each American an executor to see it enforced. I have a sentimental desire, too, that my ashes might, if not too much trouble, be scattered somewhere on the Sierras. That is all the bother I am willing to be to my fellow-soldiers when dead. And then the right to rest on untroubled after all is over ought to be somehow secured."

Hon. John M. Hungerford, of Corning, N. Y., ex-member of congress from the Twenty-ninth congressional district of that state, is dead. He was born at Vernon, N. Y., December 3, 1825; was graduated at Hamilton college in 1846, engaged in the banking business at Corning in 1848, and commenced political life as a delegate to the Republican National Convention at Philadelphia in 1872. He was elected as a republican to the Forty-fifth congress, serving his native state from October 15, 1877.

Ezra Carville, a wealthy man living three miles from Lewiston, Me., was called to the door by a stranger on the pretence of wanting help to fix a broken sleigh. Mr. Carville quietly put a cocked revolver into his pocket and followed the man, who suddenly turned and presented a pistol and demanded Carville's surrender. Mr. Carville immediately fired at the man's breast, when the stranger groaned and scrambled into a sleigh and drove rapidly toward the city, since which time he has not been seen. Mr. Carville is heir in an important contested will case, and it is believed that his murder or abduction is in view.

Mrs. James E. Wirman, of Harrison, O., writes: "Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla cured my daughter of dyspepsia and irregularities."

"THEM OR THOSE."

A Little Grammatical Question Settled in Three Minutes.

Middletown Mercury.

A few days ago, a flash young man from an eastern college arrived at Tombstone, Ari., and registered his name at the principal hotel. A socially inclined person in blue shirt and wide-rimmed hat, who chanced to be in the office, good-naturedly answered every question and volunteered a vast amount of valuable information about Arizona in general and Tombstone in particular.

"Do you see them hills over yonder?" asked the Tombstoner, pointing through one of the office windows. "Well, them hills is chock full of pay dirt."

The young man from the east looked shocked.

"My dear sir," he said proudly, but kindly, "you should say 'those hills are'—not them hills is!'"

The Tombstoner was silent for a moment. He looked the young man from the east critically over, as if he was estimating the size of coffin he would wear. Then, drawing out an ivory stocked seven-shooter of elaborate style and finish, he said in a soft, mild, musical tone of voice, that sounded like a wildwood brook coursing o'er its pebble bed; "My gentle, unsalted tenderfoot from the land of the rising sun, this her's a pint that you and me disagrees on, and we might as well have it settled right now. I haven't looked in a grammar lately, but I say 'them hills is,' is carrect, and I'm going to stand by that opinion while I've got a shot left. I'll give you just three minutes to think calmly over the subject, for you probably spoke in haste the first time, and then I'll hear your decision."

The young man from the East looked down the delicately chased barrel of the revolver into the placid depths of the eye of the Tombstoner, and began to feel that many points in grammar are uncertain are liable to grow more so. Then he thought of the coroner's inquest and of the verdict, Came to his death by standing in front of Colorado Tom's seven-shooter," and of the long pine box going east by express with $60 charges on it, and before half the three minutes was up he was ready to acknowledge his error. "Since he had thought it over calmly," he said he believed that 'them hills is' was right. He had spoken on the spur of the moment," he added, "and begged a thousand pardons for his presumptuous effort to substitute bad grammar for good."

The Tombstoner forgave him freely, and, grasping his hand, said: "I knowed you'd say you was wrong after you thought a moment. I admire a man who gives right in without arguing when he knows he's wrong. Come along and irrigate." And they irrigated.

The late Charles [illegible] of Bangor, Me., left an estate worth about $1,000,000.

[illegible] Antwerp, a city of 200,000 inhabitants, was supplied by wells and canals, and in 1876 works were built to filter the waters of the Nethe by passing them through filters of sand and spongy iron and gravel. The plan has proved successful, but the supply is very small according to American ideas, being received in a tank of only 340,000 gallons.

No fewer than thirty-seven British peerages, or not very far short of one-tenth of the entire number, became extinct or dormant in the fifteen years 1848-63. The number of deaths of peers during the same period was 300; of peeresses, 235. These figures are exclusive of two archbishops and eleven bishops. Altogether, the baronies which became extinct or dormant during the fifteen years amount to sixty.

Bishop Coxe of western New York has invited the clergy of his diocese to unite in celebrating at the cathedral in Buffalo the "office of Te Deum," in memory of the centennial of peace with Great Britain, on the 19th of April. On that day in 1783 General Washington announced peace to the army, and ordered its chaplains with the several brigades to render thanks to Almighty God for all his mercies, particularly for his overruling the wrath of man to his glory and causing the rage of war to cease among the nations."

It is said that the "Inland sea," which M. de Lesseps has gone to establish in the Desert of Sahara, will be fifteen times as large as the Lake of Geneva. The moisture engendered by its presence will bring vast tracts of desert land into cultivation, and an approach to valuable forests, now wholly inaccessible, will be facilitated. Exclusive rights over this land and the forests will compensate the company which undertakes to excavate the connecting channel. The locality is about 47 feet below the level of the Medditerranean, and unless the intervening country proves to be rocky there will be no difficulty in speedily carrying out the project.

Judge Barrows of the supreme court of Maine has within a few years sentenced nine murderers to imprisonment for life, the highest penalty which the law allows in that state. Frequent repetition does not make the duty light. "My heart is more and more oppressed," he says, "with the feeling that the number of those who harbor malice until their hearts become regardless of social duty and fatally bent on mischief is increasing in our state."

From one of the late society novels we learn that "any one walking up Fifth avenue on a fine afternoon will have observed the tired and listless expression of the grand ladies, with artificial complexions, who loll in the corners of their splendid carriages. A glance at these faces always consoled Wellingford, when he began to feel communistic, socialistic and anarchistic, as he sometimes did while beholding all the magnificence which was so utterly beyond his reach."

Olive Thorne in the Christion Union gives the following incident as tending to prove that animals reason: "One day the cat and parrot had a quarrel. I think the cat had upset Polly's food, or something of that kind; however they seemed all right again. An hour or so after, Polly was standing on the edge of the table; she called out, in a tone of deep affection, "Puss, puss, come then, come then, pussy." Pussy went, and looked up innocently enough. Polly with her beak seized a basin of milk standing by, and tipped the basin and all its contents over the cat; then chuckled diabolically. Of course it broke the basin and half drowned the cat."

New York Tribune.—The medical fraternity of St. Louis is in great perplexity over the singular malady of a young woman, about seventeen years of age, who, at intervals of from five to ten minutes, involuntarily heaves a profound and dismal sigh. She has been treated by several physicians, but not one of them has been able to afford her the slightest relief. This is a suspicious case, bearing a close analogy to the experience of six young women whose prompt recovery from a mysterious complaint upon the appearance of six young men Dr. Holmes has poetically recorded in the song of the stethoscope.

A Life Doubly Assured.

A resident of Bangor, Maine, mentions incidentally that three months ago a New England life-insurance company refused to grant him a policy on the ground that he was consumptive. "But," he adds, "thanks to the healing properties of Hales Honey of Horehound and Tar, my lungs are now perfectly sound, and I yesterday passed a medical examination, without any objection being made, and insured my life for $5,000." FLIGHTS OF ACROBATS.

The Perpendicular Leap, the Shot from a Cannon, and Other Circus Tricks.

The following is the explanation given by Lulu, the famous gymnast, of the way in which he made his perpendicular leap: It was done, he said, by means of a mechanical device. "I stood in full view of the spectators on an iron plate about a foot in diameter, which was attached to a spindle running down through a framework. This spindle was thrown up a distance of seven feet above the stage by means of rubber springs, carrying the plate with it. The springs were powerful enough to send my body through the air like a shot. Another set of rubber bands jerked the spindle back as quickly as it shot out, so that the motion both ways was too quick for sight. On reaching my distance I caught hold of ropes. It was necessary to pose my body so that it would be exactly in line with the median line of the spindle. One night at Dublin the machine was imperfect and the spring became released before I was ready, throwing me on my head and shoulders in the orchestra circle. I feel as if the earth had fallen from under me. But there is really no time for thought. I am at the ropes in an instant. I gave up this performance because I grew too stout. One day my body was almost telescoped by the shock. I then set to work to devise a machine that would enable me to distribute the force over my whole body. The result was the catapult, after several months spent in making experiments. This machine is very simple in its construction. An iron plane about fifteen feet long is suspended on an axle at a slight angle. Rubber springs are made to act so as to throw the plane forward into a position nearly perpendicular. This movement throws my body, which is lying at full length at the upper end of the plane, so that I describe an arc and alight in a net about sixty feet from the machine. I was nearly killed two or three times. The first time I was thown I lost all sense of what I was doing or where I was going. I was utterly helpless and came down into the net on my head and face. My head was so cut and bruised that my hair came out in bunches.

In London I made the experiment of using a machine much the same as the catapult, but suspended in mid-air. The springs were so adjusted that the iron beam on which I lay, when released, described almost a semi-circle, so that when my body left it I was underneath instead of on top of it. This machine threw me a distance of 200 feet almost in a straight line. My movement was so straight and so swift that it was almost impossible for me to turn my body, even once. In fact I did not recover consciousness until my force was nearly spent. The principle of the cannon from which gymnasts are sometimes hurled is the same, the only difference being that the body is sent in an oblique line upwards, instead of perpendicularly into the air. As the performer can get his position with perfect safety, this feat is not attended with much danger. The spring is released in this instrument by means of a trigger set off by explosion of powder.

WHAT CURIOSITIES EARN.

The Wages of the Giant, Midget, Bearded Lady, Fire-Eater, and Such.

St. Louis Post Dispatch.

"There are probably a dozen first-class giants in the business," said J. E. Sackett, in answer to a question, "and they get all the way from $50 to $500 a week. Colonel Goshen gets $75; Brustad, the Norwegian gets $75; Chang, the Chinaman, now in London, is paid £70 a week and his traveling expenses. Murphy, who is also over there, and who is the man in the world, gets about the same salary. Cooper, who was with Forepaugh last season, got $200. Midgets are more numerous than giants. There are over one hundred of them now on exhibition. Tom Thumb is, of course, a high-salaried curiosity. Che-Mah gets $125 a week. Jennie Quigley receives $50 a week, and Little Jewel is paid $35; General Mite and Lucia Zarata, who travel together, get $5000 a week and ten per cent. of the profits of the management; General Totman is paid $30; Major Atom; $75, and Major Dot, $50. An armless wonder, like Charles E. Tripp, who writes and otherwise uses his feet as other people use their hands, is worth $40 a week. The only legless man in existence, outside of Walter Stuart, is Eli Bowen, who has only feet and ankles growing out from his body. He commands $60 a week and is independent, owning two large and valuable farms in Michigan. Fat women are numerous, and with one or two exceptions, do not get more than $15 or $20. Mlle. Myers, the bearded lady, receives $40 a week. They average about that figure.

"Ventriloquists receive a weekly salary of from $20 to $60. Cassenovia, the chap who cuts men to pieces on the stage, $125. Other jugglers ranges as $12. Fire-eaters receives from $35 to $50. Pattie, the trained monkey man, got $15; Giovanna, the bird trainer, $60; Annelli and his trained birds, $20."

Let the Trial Proceed.

Arabi Pasha when he heard he had been denied the benefit of English counsel, promptly fortified himself with a bottle of Allen's Iron Tonic Bitters and quietly remarked: Let the trial proceed. All genuine bear the signature of J. P. Allen, St. Paul, Minn.

Twenty-four Hours to Live.

From John Kuhn, Lafayette, Ind., who announces that he is now in "perfect health," we have the following: "One year ago I was, to all appearance, in the last stages of consumption. Our best physicians gave my case up. I finally got so low that our doctor said I could not live twenty-four hours. My friends then purchased a bottle of Dr. William Hall's Balsam for the Lungs, which considerably benefitted me. I continued until I took nine bottles. I am now in perfect health, having used no other medicine."

Fate of a Deluded Widow.

Last February Mrs. Caroline Dewell of Honesdale, Pa., wife of a Baptist minister, who had died eight weeks before, eloped with Edward C. Simpson, a worthless fellow. Mrs. Dewell sold her house and personal effects, and, after putting her four children to bed one night, went away. One day this week she appeared in Honesdale, having walked all night through the wilderness, and sought her home, only to find it occupied by others, and her children, who had been cared for by the town authorities, gone. After eloping she went to Chicago with Simpson, where he got $800 from her—all she had—and left her alone without a penny. She begged and worked her way homeward, after being compelled to walk day and night.

Only Three Words in a Play.

The erratic French student, Villiers de l'Isle Adam, who recently surprised Paris with a successful play, "The New World," in which Rhode Island is painted as belonging to the tropics, has just produced another drama, or rather pantomime, for there is only a single speech in it, and that of but three words, entitled "The Fatal Error, or the Rash Husband." The curtain rises and discloses a pair of lovers seated on a bench; and engaged in tender conversation. Don Antonio, the jealous husband, enters and approaches the young people, unperceived by them. Hatred and jealousy are depicted on his countenance, his eyes flash with anger. With a sudden movement he draws a dagger and stabs the ill-fated pair, who fall without uttering a groan. The murderer then stoops over the corpses of his victims, his face lit up with an expression of fiendish joy, which, however gradually gives way to unequivocal remarks of surprise and disappointment. "The wrong persons!" he exclaims, and the curtain falls.

THE
PACIFIC NORTHWEST!
Oregon, Washington & Idaho.

Offers the best field for Emigrants—viz.: a mild, equitable, and healthy climate; cheap lands of great fertility, producing all varieties of Grain, Fruit, and Grasses, in wonderful abundance; an inexhaustible supply of Timber; vast Coal Fields, and other mineral deposits; cheap and quick transportation by railroads and river navigation; direct commerce with all parts of the world, owing to its proximity to the Pacific Ocean.

NO DROUTHS, NO INSECT PESTS, NO HURRICANES, WHIRLWINDS, or OTHER DESTRUCTIVE PHENOMENA.

The Lands of the Pacific Northwest show an average yield of wheat per acre largely in excess of that of any other section of the United States.

No failure of crops has ever occurred.

Oregon Wheat commands a higher price than that of any other country in the Liverpool market.

An immense area of very fertile Railroad and Government Lands, within easy reach of the trunk lines of the Northern Pacific R. R., the Oregon Railway & Navigation, and the Oregon & California R. R. Co.'s and their numerous branches in the great Valleys of the Columbia and its tributaries, are now offered for sale at Low Prices, and on Easy Terms, or open to pre-emption and Homestead Entry.

The great movement of population to the Columbia region now in progress will be enormously increased by the completion of the Northern Pacific R. R. and the Oregon Railway & Navigation Co.'s systems. This renders certain a rapid increase in the value of Lands now open to purchase or to entry under the United States Land Laws.

HOW TO SELECT BEEF.

Miss Parloa's Advice to Those Buying Meat.

About 100 ladies, with a sprinkling of gentlemen, listened to Miss Parloa's lecture on "Marketing," in the lecture room of the College of Pharmacy, New York, last week. Marketing had reference only to the buying of meat, and was illustrated by a side of beef and a young butcher, who looked like a theological student, who dissected the same. "Meat is not scientifically cut up anywhere," said Miss Parloa, "and that is particularly true of New York." About one-sixth of a dressed animal is desirable. That is, of course, the best kind of meat for broiling and roasting. But there are modes of preparation by which every part of an animal can be profitably used. Muscular meat, while tougher, is more nutritious, because it contains more juices. But it must be cooked so as not to be tough. If meat is properly separated you can afford to pay for what you want and the butcher to sell it. By the exercise of a little common sense you can readily determine what part of the muscles are used the most, and consequently where the tough or tender meat can be found. The legs and the neck, for instance, are used a great deal, and the meat grown there is tough. That on the back is tender, because the muscles there are little used.

The butcher proceeded to separate the hind quarter from the fore making the cut just back of the ribs. The hind quarter was first discussed. Next to the cut separating the two quarters comes the portion from which porter-house steak is cut. On the inside and next to the bone is the tenderloin. It is very tender, but not juicy, and has little flavor. Next to the backbone and surrounded by fat are the kidneys. "They and the heart," said the lecturer, "are very nice if properly prepared. They should be cooked very little or a great deal." Quarters of meat are always hung so that the juices flow away from the rump, or shoulder, settling in the porter-house or short ribs, consequently those parts contain more juices and are choicer, although there is more bone in them. Next to the porter-house is the surloin, which is the hip. "There is no steak in the animal like the round-boned surloin," said Miss Parloa. "Rump cuts contain three grades of meat and ought to be separated parallel with the backbone. The best roast in the animal is on the back of the rump. The top surlion is the toughest part of the steak, but as it contains no bone it is economical. It is hard to deal with beef for a small family, for in order to get what you want you are obliged to get more than you want. Round steak should never be cut less than one inch thick. The lower side of the round steak is very nice for a stew or for any slow method of cooking. Steaks from the top of the round must be cooked quickly, so as to harden albumen on the cut side. They should be rare." Turning to the forequarter, which after the manner of New York cutting contained all the ribs, Miss Parloa said that the only way to balance the supply and demand in beef was for housekeepers to be willing to use all portions of the animal. Then they could get any part they wanted. The first cut of rib roast was particularly economical for small families. It was thick enough, and would not spoil in cooking. The cost and value of rib roasts depends on the length of the ribs, long ribs being worth less because less is left to be worked up into corned-beef. Fat corned-beef is better than lean because the fat prevents the juices from escaping into the brine. Fillet of beef is tenderloin. In veal it is a whole slice cut from the leg. Veal cutlets are ribs, although they are also cut from the leg. Mutton or pork chops are equivalent to porter-house steak in beef. Meat ought to hang three weeks.

"If I could have my steak cut from prime well-seasoned beef, I would always have round," said Miss Parloa in closing. "For ordinary mortals, I suppose porter-house is best. Long-boned surloin is the best surloin. All the meat grown near the back is sure to be nice."

Wasting of the Brain.

Between the ages of twenty and forty there may be what is called "cerebral sclerosis"—a hardening of parts of the brain. It is due to a chronic inflammation of the brain substance. Spots in it, from the size of a pea to that of an almond, become thickened and condensed; thus crowding on the nerve-cells and nerve-fibres, cutting off their nourishment and causing them to waste wholly away.

This condition is known by the name of "atrophy." Among its symptoms are impaired mental faculties, especially the memory, melancholy, readiness to weep or laugh, slow measured speech, headache, muscular tremor, vertigo and paralysis, first in one part and then in others. It may not prove fatal short of ten or twenty years.

In senile atrophy—the atrophy of old age—there is loss not only in the nerve-cells and fibres, but in the net-work—connective tissue—by which each nerve-cell is surrounded.

In the former species of atrophy there was an actual increase of connective tissue; both the nerve-cells and the connective tissue waste together.

The brain shrivels up and becomes tough like leather, in some cases being reduced to a small part of its proper bulk.

The atrophy may be confined to one half of the brain, or it may affect both halves. Generally it has no special cause, but is simply an aggravated form of the decay which characterizes old age. [illegible]

The symptoms are [illegible] weakness, loss of memory, blunted senses, unsteady and trembling movements, childishness, apathy, disposition to sleep at length, difficulty of swallowing and breathing, ending in death. Its duration is uncertain. Meanwhile the patient needs a good diet and tonics.—Youth's Companion.

The late Charles Stetson, of Bangor, Me., left an estate valued at more than $1,000,000.

WHO WAS TO BLAME?

BY [illegible]

It was long past a late dinner hour when Court Cunningham let himself into his elegant up-town home. He was an attractive young gentleman of six and twenty, dark, lithe and very graceful. His face was clear cut, and his heavy mustache controlled a finely shaped mouth, but just now the lips were firmly closed, and a scowl on the broad, handsome brow gave an ugly and almost repulsive expression to the whole face.

The click of the night-key brought his favorite servant to his side at once.

"Come right along to the dining-room Massa Court," said the old colored man, who had been for half a century in the Cunningham family. "Missus tell the cook to keep all the things nice for you, and I'll wait upon you myself."

"I've had my dinner, thank you," the gentleman replied, kindly; "and I'll go to the library a while and read the evening papers. Where is Mrs. Cunningham, William?"

"Lor' sakes, Massa Court, the missus has had a day of it with callers—just as many seems to me as comes reception days; and now that little Miss—Miss Gloster is here."

"Go up, please, and tell my wife I am home."

And now the gentleman rolled his armchair in front of the fireplace, with its old-fashioned brass andirons and blazing logs, and sat down.

"Shall I bring your slippers, Massa Court?"

The old servant lingered by the door.

"No, William; I am going out again."

"Hadn't you better have 'em while you stay, Massa Court?"

The old man's voice was husky, and there was an unusual tremor in the sweet tones. It struck his weary companion like a wave of homesickness.

He hadn't heard that pathetic quality in his old friend's voice since his mother died. It seemed someway to bring his childhood and youth most vividly before him, and, in his present mood, it annoyed and exasperated him.

"You are worse than an old woman, William," he remarked, with some sharpness; but William did not hear it. He had left the room and closed the door without a sound.

"If a man's servant didn't have to know all his business, there would be a little more comfort in fighting it out," he said to himself, bitterly. "William knows its all wrong as well as I do," and now Mr. Court Cunningham kicked his chair back, and fell to examining the books on the library table.

There were magazines and newspapers—French, German and English. There was a volume of Taine, a pamphlet on the Vibrations of Light, a charming little edition of Tacitus, a Latin grammar and lexicon, and, last of all, Whateley's Logic. This book was held open at an abstruse place by a gentleman's kid glove.

It was a very harmless-looking little thing, stretched to slim shapelessness in order to fulfill its destiny as a book-mark.

A strangely subtle and penetrating odor met the gentleman's fastidious nostrils, as he opened the book.

Mr. Cunningham had looked for some proof of something, some hint of the probability of treachery, some "trifle light as air"—and here it was, quite as volatile as air, in the form of a recognized perfume.

But for this he might have mistaken it for one of his own odd gloves—he was always dropping them here and there, he said to himself. But this particular odor was as tangible as a love-letter.

Mr. Cunningham took the glove between his thumb and finger and tossed it into the fire.

At that moment the door opened, and a lady entered. She was of medium height, slenderly built, and of an unusual dignity of manner and carriage for so young a woman. She was certainly not over twenty, and was probably a year younger. The fluffy golden hair, worn in loose curling coil at the back of her neck, made her look like a child; but her large, expressive gray eyes, full of intense purpose and power, the poise of her head indicating directness and independence, her mouth, firm as Jeane D'Arc's when commanded to deny her convictions, spoke of a strong, resolute nature.

Certainly flirtation would be impossible to such a woman. This had been a conviction of her husband, till all of a sudden—

But here was the glove, withering and writhing in the cruel flames, looking like a snake in its convulsive moments to the man who watched it so narrowly.

"Good evening, Court," Mrs. Cunningham remarked, pausing a second to touch her lips to her husband's forehead. "I should have come before, but I was so tired that I had to take my last caller to my sitting-room, and you know folks never go there."

Mrs. Cunningham looked an angel as she seated herself in her small rocker and turned her eyes to her husband.

"You have an unusually literary table this evening, Amy."

Mr. Cunningham certainly acted like the guilty party now, for he looked everywhere but at the sweet upturned face.

"Literary!" the lady replied. "Why, I don't know. You see, I started this morning with excellent intentions. I was going to study hard all the afternoon."

"Well?"

"It was ill. It was very ill. Somebody came in, and then folks kept coming, and the day went by."

"Do you receive your callers in the library, usually?"

The gray eyes struck fire.

"In my own house, Court, I receive my callers wherever it best suits my wish and convenience."

"Was Lawrence Gage your first visitor?" he asked.

"Marriage is a singular institution," Mrs. Cunningham replied. "It gives a man such infinite privileges of insult and torture."

"Then you refuse to answer my question," he said.

"How would the law regard that question, Court? I think I shall have to add law to my list of studies."

"Logic is an excellent preparation for law," he replied.

Mrs. Cunningham searched her husband's face for a moment, rose and walked to the table, took up her Whateley, opened and closed it, and then, with an indescribable expression of pain and disgust on her lovely face, turned to leave the room.

Her husband was on his feet in an instant and put himself in her way with a muttered [illegible]

"It is my right," he began, "and if you don't tell me what I want to know, [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] this [illegible] was settled forever. Oh, Court, can you not trust your wife? [illegible]

"Those things sound very well."

The man's tone was scornful and unbelieving [illegible]

"Settled forever," he went on. "And the first thing when I come into the house, I find that man's glove in your book. Has he been here to-day, or has he not?"

"He has been here to-day."

"In this library?"

"In this library."

"And, all this after I had forbidden you to see him [illegible]."

"I am not a child nor a slave, Court Cunningham, and I will neither be forbidden nor compelled. When you feel disposed to treat me with the respect due my womanhood and my honor as your wife, I shall be pleased to consider your apologies."

"Amy!"

Mr. Cunningham took a hasty step toward his wife, and compelled her eyes to meet his—eyes on fire with rage and jealousy.

"I believe," he continued, with singular deliberation, "that you are a—liar, and I also believe——"

"Not another word!" the defiant woman commanded, holding herself at full height, and returning his intense gaze. "If you finish that sentence, so help me heaven! it will be the last word you will ever speak to me."

Mad as the man was, he yet had sense enough left to know that this was no idle threat, and for such an issue he was not prepared. So, with another curse on his lips, he turned and left the room and the house.

William met him in the hall, and with trembling hands held his overcoat and opened his umbrella.

"Hadn't you better have the coupe, Massa Court?" he inquired. "It's just a-coming right down, cats and dogs, and elephants, too, I reckon by the sound. Come back, Massa Court, please, and let me have the coupe sent round."

"Blow the coupe!" said his master.

And this was the first time in all the years of William's service that he had ever been so spoken to by his young master.

The poor old servant closed the door reluctantly and then walked into the library.

Mrs. Cunningham was leaning against her husband's armchair as the servant entered, and as she lifted her white haggard face, William threw up his hands with a gesture of despair.

"Oh missus," he exclaimed, "you look fit to sink, and Massa Court, too! Don't you think mebbe you's too peart and sort o' independent with the boy? Don't you know, missus, he ain't nebber been used to them kind o' ways? Oh, missus, don't be angry with me, I beseech you, I'm just as sorry for you, missus, as I am for Massa Court."

"I am not angry, William," Mrs. Cunningham replied, placing a trembling little hand on the old man's arm as she spoke. "I know how much you love my husband, and because I know how faithful you have been, I shall not resent anything you may feel like saying to me."

"Poor little missus!" said the tender-hearted negro. "I'se awful sorry for you. But you see, my chile, there's going to be trouble come out o' this night's work—terrible trouble, missus, I knows when I see Massa Court a-going out, with the demon of all the Cunninghams in his face, that there was bad business ahead, Missus—That wa'n't Massa Court that went down them stone steps to-night; 'twas one of them ole dead and gone Cunninghams that used to shoot somebody every other day, and take it out on the poor niggers 'tween times."

"William, do you mean what you say, or are you going to frighten me?"

Mrs. Cunningham's face was like the face of the dead in its pallor and rigidity.

"I mean what I say, missus, and I don't make do mistake."

"Get ready to go out, then this instant; and, William, remember this: I depend upon you to see that nothing goes amiss to-night. I am of no account for I am only a woman; but you can protect my friend and save your master."

Then Mrs. Cunningham sat down to the library-table and dashed off a note. It was directed to "Mr. Lawrence Gage, ——Hotel."

CHAPTER II.

Court Cunningham had been married a year. For ten months everything had gone happily and merrily. Then trouble came into their elysium. At first a vague impression only on the part of the husband; then more definite and tormenting as the weeks wore on.

The name of this haunting shadow was Lawrence Gage.

At first Mrs. Cunningham seemed to regard her husband's jealousy as a good joke. She coquetted with his mood and laughed at all he said.

Then, as it grew more serious, her pride asserted itself, and she not only refused to give him the satisfaction of an explanation of any fresh grievance, but would not listen to his reproaches nor heed his commands.

That morning Mr. Cunningham had found Lawrence Gage's card on his wife's dressing-table, and a stormy scene ensued.

Mrs Cunningham had taken from the first the high ground of her own personal responsibility for her actions and her own freedom [illegible], sensible and conscientious wo[man], and would not brook the slightest restraint or dictation.

She was a very beautiful woman, and a great social favorite. She was admired and sought after by both men and women, and up to Lawrence Gage's time had always conducted herself to her husband's satisfaction.

Lawrence Gage was a popular member of Mr. Cunningham's club—a man always deferred to in all business meetings, and the life of social gatherings.

He was fine-looking, somewhat reserved with all his close personal friends, generous, courageous, and a man with a secret. This especially endeared him to the opposite sex, and did not hurt him with his brethren.

To send a note to the object of a husband's suspicions by the hands of his own tried and trusted body-servant was a strange thing for guilty woman to do, but it was in perfect harmony to all the rest of this woman's behavior, and the faithful fellow put the note in his pocket and started off on his singular errand as if it were the most natural thing in the world for him to do.

"Take the first coach you can find," Mrs. Cunningham had told him, "and remember that all my dependence is on you."

Mr. Gage was not at the hotel, and William drove to the club-house.

He had been there often enough to perfectly understand the place, and after a little finessing managed to obtain a view of the gentlemen who were engaged in dining without being seen himself.

At one table only a very few feet from where the old servant stood, talking and laughing gaily with another gentleman, was the object of the search. At another table, only a short distance away, William recognized his young master. He was drinking wine with several [illegible]

[illegible]

William quickly detected danger. [illegible] been intensified rather than [illegible] by wine. He was not in such haste [illegible] this enemy of his domestic peace, but would wait and rather enjoy the process.

Mr. Cunningham was not in the habit of taking too much wine, and his loving old friend could scarcely keep the tears back as he noted the sudden determination in the looks and manners of his handsome young master.

"Some fellows think a good deal more of their horses than they do of their wives," the gentleman dining with Gage banteringly remarked.

"Am I expected to make a personal application of the gentleman's words?" Mr. Cunningham inquired.

Though William could not see his master's face, he knew that the baneful light of all "the old dead-and-gone Cunninghams" was in his eyes.

"I beg your pardon, Cunningham," the man who had offended remarked. "It was a very poor joke. Treat it with the contempt it deserves, and have mercy on the perpetrator."

Everybody laughed but Cunningham. He sipped his wine in sullen silence.

The situation was growing every moment more desperate, and William with the keen intuition of his race, was sure that when Lawrence Gage made a move to leave the house, his master would follow and assault him. This was possible as any moment.

If anything was to be done, it must be done quickly.

After a moment's reflection, William advanced to the inner hall and beckoned to Lawrence Gage's waiter, a young colored man with whom he happened to have some acquaintance.

"Mum's the word now, Jim," said William; "but if you let me have your coat and white tie long 'nuf to say ten word to Mr. Gage in dar, I'll give you five dollars."

"All right, boss," his companion responded. "Two minutes, you say—no longer."

"That's the length of time I want it for," said William. "And now peel."

This was business, and Jim took the old servant into a small, unoccupied apartment, and the change was quickly effected.

William was sure he could reach the table occupied by Mr. Gage, remove the dishes and deliver the note without being recognized by his master.

He need not see his face, and it was not likely the other gentleman would observe him. He was too loyal and too cautious to send the note in.

There might be some hitch, some mistake; and so, napkin and salver in hand, the faithful serving-man entered the dining-room.

Mr. Gage's companion had, fortunately, left the table, and was talking with a group of gentlemen standing near his master.

As the amateur waiter stooped a little to pick up the dishes, he said, in a clear undertone:

"Mr. Gage, I'se William. Don't 'pear surprised. Read this note quick's you can, and do what it says for the love of the Lord, don't let Massa Court see you."

The ruse was perfectly successful, and before any one had a chance even to speculate about the new figure in the dining-room, the original waiter was at his post again, and William, disguised in a long waterproof coat, his face concealed by a huge oilskin cap, stood waiting for further developments.

Lawrence Gage read the few hastily written words, then tore the paper into infinitesimal fragments.

"Keep out of my husband's way to-night," was the drift of the communication.

Whatever Lawrence Gage's faults may have been, there was nothing of the coward about him.

To keep out of Court Cunningham's way was to run away: and how could a gentleman so degrade himself? Then, again, how could he refuse to be governed by the warning he had received under such strange circumstances.

His first duty was certainly to Mrs. Cunningham, so he rose from the table and lounged into the reading-room; then he dispatched a waiter for his coat and hat. Up to this time it was plain that his enemy had not missed him.

In his long waterproof coat and disguising hat, Lawrence Gage might have been a coal heaver or a millionaire, and as he stepped into the vestibule he smiled to see his exact counterpart in the servant of his bitterest enemy.

"Much obliged, William, till you are better paid," he said, kindly. "That note put me in a deuce of a hole, but tell your mistress it is all right."

At that moment William's quick ear heard a hurried, impetuous step approaching and giving his companion a desperate and dexterous push into a dark angle of the broad, winding stairway, hurried down to the carriage which he had told to wait for him.

This second ruse was also successful. His master, perfectly familiar with Gage's rainy-weather costume, had mistaken his old servant for his bitterest foe.

William had just time to give the street and number to the driver, when his master, pistol in hand, reached the carriage, leaned into it, taking as deliberate aim as his unsteady nerves would permit.

The old servant, with his hat well over his eyes, snatched the revolver and threw it under the seat, then seized his murderous master under the arms, and dragged him into the carriage by main strength. It was no use to squirm or kick. The great muscular hands held him with the strength of a vise to the bottom of the carriage.

The rain was still pouring in torrents, and it was pitch dark in the carriage. It was no use to swear, either, though Court Cunningham used the tabooed words of his mother-tongue with a professional precision which somewhat astonished his old friend.

When they reached the house, William opened the carriage door, and helped his master to the sidewalk with the same skill he had used in forcing him into the carriage. Then he closed the door again, and gave orders to the driver to move on. He felt confident that the young gentleman had enough for one night, and would go into the house and go to bed.

Fifteen minutes after this, William, who had let himself in by the kitchen door, stood in his master's room in his long flannel wrapper, yawning heavily, as if just awakened from a sound sleep.

Mr. Cunningham sat in front of the grate, apparently dazed mentally, and used up physically.

"Anything wrong, Massa Court?"

No answer.

"You better tuck right into bed, Massa Court. Shan't I bring you something hot, chile?"

There was no reply to this, but Mr. Cunningham lifted his right foot for his servant to remove his shoe, then his left, and after a while roused sufficiently to submit to the disrobing process.

William waited till his master was sound asleep, and then crossed to his mistress' sitting-room and knocked softly at the door.

"Well?" [illegible]

There was a little color in the lady's face now, but she was still under great excitement, and her companion hastened to relate the occurrences of the evening [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] tell you now, chile, folks has to knuckle sometimes, and taint no disgrace missus. You have done your part nobly, William, and I will do mine."

Mrs. Cunningham tucked her fair little hand in the great, black one, and then William silently left the room.

Mr. Cunningham had his breakfast at ten o'clock the following morning. His wife presided at the coffee-urn. At the conclusion of the silent meal, the little lady took her husband's arm, and led him to the library.

"It is too late now," the miserable husband remarked, drawing her arm away more in sorrow than in anger. "Lawrence Gage will kill me to-day, or I shall kill him. It will be the one who shoots first, Amy. Remember that."

"Oblige me with one moment, Court," Mrs. Cunningham insisted. "Then, if you want to go, you can."

A lady rose from the low rocker as the husband and wife entered the room.

"Court, allow me to introduce you to my friend. You have always known her as Miss Gloster. She has passed through a world of trouble, and is the divorced wife of Lawrence Gage."

With this William threw the library-door open, and the gentleman in question walked in.

"And allow me to finish the sentance Mr. Cunningham. We are to be remarried to-morrow. Your wife has brought us together again—managed every detail of the unfortunate business—and made me the happiest man in New York. I have been all to blame, just as you would have been had you brought your unjust quarrel to an issue."

"Great heaven!" said Court Cunningham, "Amy," turning to his wife who was smiling through her tears—"Amy, is this true?"

"Yes; and because you accused me so unjustly, I could not explain. Forgive me, Court, I beg of you."

For answer he took the little woman in his arms and covered her with kisses.

Then the two men shook hands, and Mr. Cunningham said, with a dubious smile:

"I suppose, Gage, you did the square thing last night, but I swear to you it will always be the humiliation of my life."

"What do you mean?" the gentleman inquired.

"Why, the way you dragged me into that infernal carriage, and held me down on the floor, and kicked me out at my own door when you had finished with me."

"Look here, Cunningham!" his companion responded with a laugh, "I pledge you my honor I never saw you after I left the club house. You remember you drank more than was good for you last night."

"Hang it all! so I did!" said the gentleman, musingly, "and upon my word I really believe I must have been drunk."

HIS LAST COURT.

Story of the Sternest Judge Arkansas Ever Had—The Case of an Outcast Daughter in His Court.

Old Judge Grepson, a justice of the peace, was never known to smile. He came to Arkansas years ago, before the "carpet-baggers" began their reckless sway, and year after year, by the will of the voters, he held his place as magistrate. The lawyers who practiced in his court never joked with him, because everyone soon learned that the old man never engaged in levity. Every morning, no matter how bad the weather might be, the old man took his place behind the bar, which, with his own hands, he had made, and every evening, just at a certain time, he closed his books and went home. No one ever engaged him in private conversation, because he would talk to no one. No one ever went to his home, a little cottage among the trees in the city's outskirts, because he had never shown a disposition to make welcome the visits of those who even lived in the immediate vicinity. His office was not given him through the influence of "electioneering," because he never asked any man for his vote. He was first elected because, having once been summoned in a case of arbitration, he exhibited the executive side of such a legal mind that the people nominated and elected him. He soon gained the name of "the hard justice," and every lawyer in Arkansas referred to his decisions. His rulings were never reversed by the higher courts. He showed no sentiment in decision. He stood upon the platform of a law which he made study, and no man disputed him.

Several days ago a woman charged with misdemeanor was arraigned before him. "The old man seems more than ever unsteady," remarked a lawyer as the magistrate took his seat. "I don't see how a man so old can stand the vexations of a court much longer."

"I'm not well to-day," said the judge, turning to the lawyer, "and any cases you may have you will please dispatch them to the best, and let me add, quickest of your ability."

Every one saw that the old man was unusually feeble, and no one thought of a scheme to prolong a discussion, for all the lawyers had learned to reverence him.

"Is this the woman?" asked the judge. "Who is defending her?"

"I have no defense, Your Honor," the woman replied. "In fact I do not think that I need any, for I am here to confess my guilt. No man can defend me," and she looked at the magistrate with a curious gaze. "I have been arrested on a charge of disturbing the peace, and I am willing to submit my case. I am dying of consumption, Judge, and I know that any ruling made by the law can have but little effect on me;" and she coughed a hollow, hacking cough, and drew around her an old black shawl that she wore. The expression on the face of the magistrate remained unchanged, but his eyelids dropped and he did not raise them when the woman continued: "As I say, no man can defend me. I am too near that awful approach, to pass which we know is everlasting death to soul and body. Years ago I was a child of brightest promise. I lived with my parents in Kentucky. Wayward and lighthearted, I was admired by all the gay society in the neighborhood. A man came and professed his love for me. I don't say this, judge, to excite your sympathy, I have many and many a time been drawn before courts, but I never before spoke of my past life." She coughed again, and caught a flow of blood on a handkerchief which she pressed to her lips. "I speak of it now because this is the last court on earth before which I will be arraigned. I was fifteen years old when I fell in love with the man. My father said he was bad, but I loved him. He came again and again, and when my father said that he should come no more I ran away and married him. My father said I should never come home again. I had always been his pride and had loved him so dearly, but he said that I must never again come to his home—my home, the home of my youth and happiness. How I longed to see him. How I yearned to put my head on his breast. My husband became addicted to drink. He abused me. I wrote to my father, asking him to let me come home, but the answer that came was, 'I do not know you.' My husband died—yes, cursing God and died. Homeless, and wretched, and with my little boy I went out into the world. My child died and I bowed down and wept over a pauper's grave. I wrote to my father again, but he answered: 'I know not those who disobey my commandment!' I turned away from that letter hardened. I spurned my teachings. Now I am here."

Several lawyers rushed forward. A crimson tide flowed from her lips. They leaned her lifeless head back against the chair. The old magistrate had not raised his eyes. "Great God!" said a lawyer, "he is dead!"

The woman was his daughter.

COMMANDER CORRINGE.

Interesting Episodes in the History of the Man Who Brought Home the Obelisk.

A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune has written an interesting account of the career of Lieutenant Commander Corringe, who brought the Egyptian Obelisk from Alexandria to New York, from which the following extract is made:

When he was nineteen years old he found himself in New York harbor at the end of a cruise, with the offer of a ship the next voyage.

But our war had broken out, and it was a greater inducement to him than the ship-owner's offer. He made up a little bundle of clothes and enlisted on the first vessel he came to. In a few months he was a commissioned officer, and was soon noted as one of the most daring youngsters on the Mississippi. The circumstances of the first promotion were characteristic.

A gun's crew had been swept from their position by a shell, and a second and a third were scattered by musketry—for the gun was a large one and was in a position to do much damage to the enemy. The young sailor saw it, and with the fun of a holiday in his face and the coolness of frost in his movements he rolled shot enough up and stowed powder enough for two or three charges, and began performances.

Of course he could not handle the gun alone, and equally of course it had to be loaded. So he got astride of it, and with the powder under one arm and a rammer under the other, worked out to the muzzle and rammed the charge home; then back he came and returned to his perch with the shot which he treated likewise; then back to the lanyard, and the "dog" barked, and it bit a piece out of the enemy's hull that bled in splinters of iron and wood.

This he repeated as long as the engagement lasted, and, by the time the work of "cleaning up" was accomplished, he had forgotten all about it. Imagine, then, his dismay when he was summoned to the quarter-deck. He quaked in his shoes, and racked his brain to remember what point of discipline he had violated.

The captain's voice began, and it went on until out of the buzzing sound in his ear he distinguished the words: "—Meritorious conduct. We will give you either a medal or a promotion. Which will you have?"

With an effort he pulled himself together, and answered:

"A medal. For that I can send to my mother."

It was now the turn of the officers to be astonished—for promotion was the thing preferred by all the men, as it meant privileges of rank and grog. They began to notice the young English recruit after this, and his name soon became a byword in the fleet for gallantry and unmitigated "pluck." His gold lace widened and his epaulets grew, and in a short time he had an independent command.

One of his adventures was cleverly turned, and enjoyed by him as much as any joke could be that he ever perpetrated.

In sailing up and down he found a good deal of want among the planters' families along the shores, particularly among those whose men were fighting on the wrong side. Charity knows no politics; so many a ration did he give to suffering women and children.

One family, consisting of a mother and two daughters, was especially needy, and apparently as grateful as poor. Their home became a sort of stopping place in the short anchorages; and the friendship culminated in an invitation to supper the night before the little craft under his command was to sail for Vicksburg. The note was warm and cordial, and included all the officers; also the boat's crew who were to wait at table and have a separate supper afterward.

Acceptances were sent; and at dusk officers in their best togs, pulled ashore.

The road to the house was built on piles across the bayou, and a heavy swamp lay on each side. As Captain Gorringe went along he heard, coming through the dusk from somewhere, a sharp whisper: "Massa! Massa!"

He stopped and peered right and left; but nothing was visible. He started on, and again the shrill, sibilant cry came to him:

"Massa! Massa!"

Again he stopped, and spoke roundly

"My man, step out and show yourself What do you want?"

A woolly head rose out of the swamp. Green ooze fell from the naked shoulders under it and a pair of jet-black eyes—the negroes have the only really black eyes in the world—rolled wildly about as the answer was chattered out:

"Marse Cap'en, don't go to de house. You'se gwine to be took to-night sho' Miss Ginnie she don sen' me to Marse Jim——shaming a somewhat noted guerrilla wid' a note this mawnin; and when he read it he done laugh fit to kill himself, and said, 'tell her ob co's I'll come; and I'll serve dat d—— Yankee right.' Dat d——Yankee's you, Massa; and if you gwine——O lawd! what' dat."

And down be went like a water rat.

But it was only a tramp of a boat's crew coming along the road. Captain Gorringe called upon the black diver, and got full of particulars, all of which wound up with:

"Ef Miss Ginnie eber does fine out 'bout dish yer, she'll skin me, sho's I'se bawn!"

A consultation was held, and it was decided to go back to the vessel, arm, and arrange an attack counter to that of their gentle hostess.

The guests were only a little late, and Madam and the two daughters were charmingly provoked by the delay, and graciously mollified by the excuses offered. They were especially urgent that the officers should lay aside their swords. It was so warm, had they not better open their coats and take off their sword belts? But no—the officers preferred to keep them on; and supper was discussed with relish.

Half way through the meal the dining room door was opened and a number of "butternuts" appeared with muskets and a summons to surrender.

Out of every blue jacket's breast came a revolver; and the six sailors tossed their cutlasses up in salute, and awaited orders.

Tableau!

The women shrieked and fled; and as they cleared the door a concerned whiff blew out the candles, a pistol-shot rang through the window near our Captain, and a loud cheer outside announced a not altogether pleasant surprise for "Marse Jim" and his friends. A little gunpowder and a good deal of sulphur in the shape of "swear-words" cleared the atmosphere, and "Marse Jim" and his soldiers were trotted off to the first handy gun-boat as prisoners of war.

The captain was horribly wounded at Port Hudson, and is lamed for life from it, but he is a gallant looking fellow, and the limp adds interest to his stalwart, handsome figure.

MLLE. FINGER.

Some Account of a Female Nihilist—Her Wiles and Her Works.

A correspondent, writing from St. Petersburg says: The capture of an important female Nihilist took place in the person of Mlle. Philippoff, better known under her maiden name of Finger. The Russian police officials were searching for her for about five years with success, though they had convincing proofs of her active participation in all the recent Nihilistic crimes. She was wanted for lending a helping hand to the Nihilists who were at different times digging the ground under divers railroad lines, with the object of blowing up the late Emperor's train with dynamite. She was mixed up in the celebrated robbery of the Kherson treasury vaults by the Nihilists, and is said to have been in St. Petersburg at the time of the assassination of Alexander II., having a thorough knowledge of the terrible plot. Belonging to the middle class of Russian provincial society, Mlle. Finger was rightly famed for her beauty and her remarkable smartness. She has studied medicine in the university of Zurich, Switzerland, obtaining a diploma of M. D., then she returned to Russia and married a young assistant of the Procuror of the court of Kazan; after three months of married life she left her husband and could not be laid hands on for five years, baffling all the traps set for her by the Russian detectives, but being invariably heard of in conjunction with all Nihilistic crimes of late years.

The jubilations of the Russian police and their pride at capturing Mlle. Philippoff are better imagined than described. As soon as the celebrated lady Nihilist was brought to the capital, all the officials of high standing hurried to see her, and found it hard to resist the combined power of her glib tongue and her beauty. The Chief of the Secret Police Force in St. Petersburgh—M. Orgewsky—went to see her first, with the object of impressing her with the gravity of her situation, but after a few minutes of conversation with her he beat a hasty retreat, remembering—as the gossips of the capital say—that he has been but lately married, in the presence of the Imperial couple, to the young and accomplished Princess Nathalie Shahovskoy, and being suddenly seized with a mortal fear to be unable to resist the charmer, Mlle. Philippoff. Then Count Tolstoy, the Minister of the Interior, volunteered to see the fair prisoner. He, however, being an old man, was no more afraid of the consort or the best half of his life, and, staying an hour and a half in the cell of Mlle. Philippoff, left it—as he himself subsequently owned—well nigh overpowered by the woman's arguments, feeling himself almost converted to Nihilism for an hour or so after the interview was over. The whole population of the capital is eager to see Mlle. Philippoff, but only a few old, privileged individuals are admitted to her presence, since it is seriously feared that, were the younger of the officials allowed to visit her, she possibly would succeed in persuading one of them to let her escape from prison in his clothes, the gentleman remaining behind in guise of a hostage, to be disposed of by the government.

True Ghost Stories.

London Letter to the Liverpool Mercury.

The two ghost stories told by our most eminent anatomist are as romantic in their way as any told by the Psychological society. When hardly more than a lad at Lancaster, the future defender of the vivisection was studying for the medical profession, he had a horror of the ghastly details of the business, which he imagined he could never overcome. He was cured, strange to say, by a fright. Having to take some medicine on a windy night to Lancaster Castle, he had to pass through the room in which he had taken part in dissections. Just as he entered the room with the basket of medicine under his arm, the clouds which hid the moon suddenly parted, a door slammed, and looking up, the future biologist saw what he thought was an enormous figure in white, with arms outstretched, looking down upon him.

He turned around trembling, and against the wall opposite stood another figure in white. He dropped his basket and ran. The patients in the Lancaster castle got no medicine that night; but when he returned next day and found that he had been frightened by mortuary sheets, he braced his nerves up so that he was soon collecting skulls. He made a fine set, but for a long time he could not get an Ethiopian skull. At last an negro died in Lancaster castle, and the young doctor got permission to have his head. It was again a windy night when the operation of removing the head was determined upon. But habited in his long cloak, then the fashion, and provided with a blue bag, the comparative anatomist soon had the head safely stowed away. As he left the room in which the coffin lay, however, the wind slammed the door, caught his cloak, and nearly threw him upon his face. Attempting to recover himself he lost his hold of the bag, the head fell out and rolled with increasing velocity down a flight of steps across a court yard, and settled itself upon the neck, with one eye open and the other shut, in a room where two women shrieked. The professor rushed wildly after it, took no notice of the women, seized the skull, put it in his bag again, and ran from the castle. Four or five years afterward he was attending a dying woman, who called loudly for a clergyman, to whom she had something to tell. The doctor begged her to tell him, as there was no clergyman near enough to be called in time. At length she spoke. "Oh, sir, I had a husband who was a negro, and, I fear, a bad man. He died sir in Lancaster Castle, and, oh! sir, I was standing one day in one of the rooms when my husband's head came out of the floor, and seemed to ask me to help him. And then, sir, the devil came through the floor, snatched up the head, put it into a bag, and disappeared before I could do anything. And I have never done anything. Oh, sir, what can I do for my poor husband's soul?"

Mental Relaxation.

A Washington letter says the terrible strain to which scientific mind is sometimes subjected is a fact beyond dispute. It is said that Prof. Baird, the president of the Fish Commission and the head of the great Smithsonian Institution, is a faithful reader of the New York Ledger. He has read every number of the paper from the date of its first publication, and he even reads all the continued stories. He loves to talk with scientific men about the possibilities of a forthcoming chapter, whether the lovely Lady Fitzhugh Montgomery, who has been seized by the black-bearded villian and carried off on a fiery steed in the midst of a storm that rocks the universe, will be rescued by the handsome Hugh de Villiers or not. Out of compliment to the learned professor nearly all his associates read the Ledger now, so as to be able to talk with him about his favorite heroes and heroines. The one exception is Prof. Baw, who would not, to save his immortal soul, read a story of any kind. When he wants to amuse or relax himself, the elaborate reports of the Bureau of Statistics furnish him ample material.

FROM "PEARLS OF THE FAITH."

"Every man shall die."—Al Beidhawi.
[illegible] how there sate with Solomon
A prince of India, and there passed them by Azrael, Angel of Death, on shadowy plumes;
With great eyes gazing earnestly, as one
Who wonders, gazing. And, because the prince
Sate with the king, he saw what the king saw,
The Djins and Angels, and saw Azrael
Fixing on him those awful searching eyes.
"What name, I pray thee, wears yon messenger?"
He asked he of the king, and Solomon
Made answer, "It is Azrael, who calls
The souls of men." "He seemed," whispered the prince,
"To have an errand unto me; bid now
That one among thy demon ministers
Waft me, upon the swiftest wing that beats,
To India, for I fear him." Solomon
Issued command, and a swift Djin sprang forth
Bearing the prince aloft, so that he came
To Coromandel ere the fruit—which fell
Out of the fig—had touched the marble floor.
Thereupon Azrael said to Solomon,
"I looked thus earnestly upon the man
In wonder, for my Lord spake, 'Take his soul
In India;' yet behold he talked with thee
Here in Judæa! Now, see, he hath gone
There where it was commanded he should die."
Then followed Azrael. In that hour the prince
Died of a hurt, sitting in India.

CLOCK WORK.

"My! no!" said Mrs. Poysett, laughing at the very idea; "we ain't afraid to stay in the house one night 'thout men-folks. Be we, Lindy?"

"I guess not," said black-eyed Linda, cheerfully, washing her hands as a preliminary to putting the bread in the pans.

"Frank says, when John wrote him to come and stay a day over in Boston: 'You'll be afraid, mother, with all Lindy's presents in the house.' And he was real put out at first because I wouldn't have some of the neighbors come in to sleep."

"Well, I don't blame you, ef you feel's ef you could sleep—on'y two women folks," said the caller, sharp-featured Miss Haines, with prominent elbows and emphatically-clean calico. "It 'ud on'y amount to makin' up a bed for nuthin'."

"Yes," Mrs. Poysett went on, accompanying the slicing of apples for pies with the regular swing of her rocking chair, while she now and then placed a particularly thin and inviting piece of the fruit in her mouth, "that's what I thought. Ten—leven—Lindy, when you go into the other room, I wish you'd strike that clock round. It strikes one too many."

"Yes'm," said brisk Linda; and then, trying to extricate the recipe for composition cake from inevitable dreams about her wedding day, she forgot the clock—and made an incident for this story.

"Your presents are handsome, Lindy; there's no mistake about that," said the visitor, turning the conversation skillfully to the quarter toward which the town interest was just then tending.

"Yes," answered Linda, blushing a little. She had grown used to blushing of late. "People have been very kind to me."

"No more'n you deserve," said Miss Haines, oracularly, and with an emphasis that left no room for denial. "Folks say to me, 'John Willey's been pretty stiddy to go out West and make a home, 'n' then come back 'n' marry the girl he's been with ever sence they was child'en.' But I say to 'em, 'No credit to him. No more'n he'd ought'r done. Lindy's pure gold, and he's got the sense to see it.'" And she finished her eulogy on the doorstep, perhaps to avoid having the matter disputed, while Linda went back to her cooking table, laughing, and still gratefully rosy over the sense that everybody in general was far too good to her. It was a case of the smooth running of deep waters. She and John Willey had been prosaically faithful to each other for years before he asked her promise to marry him. Eighteen months ago he had gone West to set up in business as a carriage builder, and now, having prospered, was coming East for his wife. Within two days' journey of home he had written to ask Frank, Linda's brother, to meet him in Boston for a day's sight-seeing and an evening at the theater. Perhaps you would say that the ideal lover should have hastened to his lady on the wings of the wind, or with all the power of steam; but Linda thought differently.

"It was just like him—wasn't it, mother?"—she said that very morning, after Miss Haines had gone, "to think Frank would be the better for a change. I'd rather have him go to Boston for a good time than see John one day sooner. And I'm sure nobody could speak stronger than that, could they, mother?"

"I don't know what I shall do without you, Lindy," said the mother, rather irrelevantly, putting down the knife to wipe away a furtive tear with her apron. "I'm sure I don't know."

Linda was at her side in an instant, with a tear of her own, and the two women kissed, laughed, and went on with their work, as they had done a hundred times within the last fortnight. For Mrs. Poysett had the equable temperament that sometimes accompanies rotundity of form and a double chin, and Linda, besides being sensible, could not keep miserable very long at a time. Thus you perceive that circumstances were rendering it as easy as possible for them to weather the gale of coming separation.

Meanwhile, everybody in the township was not rotund and possessed of double chins, not all the houses were keepers of new and shining wedding-gifts, and, strange to say, not everybody was happy. Pete Haydon, who lived down in pan lane, was poor and savagely discouraged. He made shoes ordinarily, but that winter there were no shoes to be had. His was a fine and practiced hand; he could do all sorts of jobs, from cleaning a watch to building a chimney, but nobody saw fit to have making or mending done. There had only been four or five pieces of work since fall for Tinker Pete, for none of which could he in conscience ask more than fifteen cents. His wife fell sick, the children's clothes were too shabby for school, and just then some one tapped him on the arm and tempted him.

One morning a stranger strolled into town and stopped at Pete's little shop to ask his way. He was traveling to Southfield, so he said.

"Where had he been?"

"Oh, anywhere," airily and jauntily; "traveling about the country. Might take up with work somewhere, if I found any worth doing."

"Hard times," said Pete, looking moodily at the little red stove. "What's your trade?"

"I've been a sailor," said the man, filling his pipe—a process Pete watched greedily, for his own tobacco box was empty. "Twenty years before the mast. I should have been a captain before this time—but there's jealousies. So I got sick of it. I call myself a landsman now."

"You don't have the look of a sailor," said Pete, his eyes traveling from the shabby fur cap and the dark face with rather narrow, bold black eyes down over the shabby suit of brown.

The man gave a slight start and glanced at him keenly. "You don't think so? Well, I've been on land some time now. Salt water's easy to shake off. What might your name be?"

"Haydon—Pete Haydon."

"And mine's Job Whettles. Queer name, ain't it? Don't believe there's another like it in the country. Good day, mate. If I'm round this way again I'll look in on you."

And he did.

One day, as Pete was soldering a milk-pail for Mrs. Burge, this time whistling a little, having work to whistle over, the man came in without warning of rap or voice.

"Thought you's twenty-five mile away afore this," said Pete, plying his iron. "Take a seat."

"Things don't please me much over that way," said the fellow, pompously, again beginning to cut his tobacco, perhaps as a cover to his furtive glances. "I may stay round here a spell. Perhaps I'll do a bit of work on somebody's farm."

"Can't get it," said Pete, briefly, viewing his completed job with approval. "Ain't no farm work to be had just now."

"Well, doing chores, I mean—light work. I'm not particular how little I do for my board," with a coarse laugh.

"Folks do their own work round here," said Pete. "Some of 'em have got money enough to pay, but they're able-bodied, as it happens, and don't want a hired man round in the winter."

"Seems a pity—don't it?—that things can't be equally divided, so that you and I could have our share," said the stranger, puffing industriously at his pipe, but not forgetting to watch the tinker. "I should like to help myself to somebody's pile; now, shouldn't you? Honestly enough, of course, man. You needn't jump. I mean, suppose the young fellow that owns the big farm over there—Poysett—should say, 'Whettles, take half my bank stock. I don't need it all;' do you think I should say 'no'?"

Of course the tinker laughed at the fanciful notion. He was a sunny-tempered fellow; it hardly needed a very bright thing to provoke his mirth.

Where Whettles stayed at night was a mystery. Sometimes Pete suspected he might have slept in a barn, he turned up so tousled in the morning; often he guessed that Toppan, the saloon keeper, had given him a lodging, from the fumes that lingered about his shabby person. He had money at times, for again and again he treated Pete to a cheering glass of whisky. Pete was not used to frequenting the saloon; he did not in the least approve of it; but it happened that about this time this evil bird of prey sought his company more persistently than did any more respectable person. And Whettles was a sociable fellow; he could tell more stories in half an hour than any six of the honest people Pete knew taken together. He was, so Pete concluded, nobody's enemy but his own. It would take more time than you are willing to give, and a deeper knowledge of mental intricacies than I possess, to detail the process through which Pete was brought to the point of promising to creep into the Poysett farm house and rifle the old desk that stood between the sitting-room windows. The grocer's bill was growing longer, his wife was paler, and she worried him by entreaties to let Whettles alone and forsake Toppan's; the aggregate of such straws is not small.

The opportunity came, fitting the mood as exactly as if the mood had made it. Frank Poysett was going to Boston to meet John Willey; the "women folks" would be alone.

"You take Poysett's," said Whettles; "you know the lay of the land there; and the same night I'll try Turner's, over on the hill. We'll meet somewhere about 1, down there under the big elm, and divide. After that I'll make tracks across lots and take a train somewhere; nobody'll think of you."

Tinker Pete was equally sure of nobody suspecting him. He had always been honest—this he thought with a pause—and, being a simple-minded sort of fellow, he never calculated the effect in other people's eyes of having been seen with Whettles.

"But s'pose my courage gives out," he said uncertainly. "I don't know's I can do it, after all. It's easy enough to get in, but what if somebody should see me?" It might end in what's worse.

"Man alive!" said Whettles, impatiently. "Afraid at your time of life? Well, here's what I'll do. They go to bed early; you can have it over by midnight. Now, I'll come back that way, and if you're there and afraid to stir, I'll go in and do it myself. But, mind, I don't expect you're going to back out. If I have to do all the work, I get all the pay."

"Oh, I mean to do it fast enough," said Pete, doggedly. "Things can't be much worse off than they are now."

"And if I ain't there by 12, you'll know somethin's happened and I can't come; so you'll have to go on your own hook. But be sure you're at the big tree by 1."

Whettles, like many another skillful tactician, did not tell his catspaw all his plans. He had no intention of doing what might be done for him. It was only politic to assure Pete of helping him out should his courage fail for fear, under too great dread, that he might break away from the plan altogether. Whettles, who had as little right to this name as to many another article he had possessed at various times, was as truly an arrant coward as a villain. All his ill deeds, and they were numerous, had been done, as far as he could manage it, at the expense of somebody else. If the robbery at Turner's seemed feasible without too much danger, he would keep his word; if not, there was at hand the excuse of having been watched or prevented, and Pete could be coaxed or treated into sharing what spoil he had from the Poysetts'.

That evening Mrs. Poysett and Linda had an early tea, and, having done the in-door work, sat down for one of the quiet talks that had grown so precious because they were so soon to cease. The journey to Illinois was so long, and Linda's beginning a new life such a serious matter, that it seemed the two would never have done talking it all over. Henry, the nearest neighbor's boy, had shut up the barn long ago, the milk was strained, and the pails were washed.

"I've laid out a dozen o' them coarse crash towels for your dishes, Lindy," said Mrs. Poysett. "Yes, I know you've got a lot o' new ones; but you can't have too many o' such things. There ain't any such thing as bein' extravagant about keepin' your dishes clean and shiny. Your grandmother Poysett used to say she believed I'd like a clean towel to every cup. Lindy, how glad I am that you ain't got to live with a mother-in-law!" A husky sigh of relief was here Mrs. Poysett's tribute to the memory of the woman who had made the first ten years of her married life a discipline.

"To think John and Frank will be here to-morrow night at 7 o'clock!" said Linda dreamily. "We'll have quince for supper, won't we, Mother?"

"Yes; and I guess we'd better be abed just as early as we can get there. You be fastenin' up, and I'll wind the clock." Mrs. Poysett did that in the dark, for Linda had taken the lamp into the kitchen. "Eight! Well, I declare," said the good lady as the clock struck after she had groped her way up stairs. "And it's right, too; for Lidy put it round this mornin'. Seems to me it took you a good while," she went on, as Linda came in with the lamp. "I don't b'lieve but what you went through some extra fastenin' up, now we're alone."

"Not a bit, mother," said Linda, with a smile cut short by a yawn. "I stopped to put the cat out."

"I always think of what your father said," mused the old lady. "It was after the Hampstead murder. We never'd had our doors fastened in the world till then; and as soon as news of that come, everybody was scared to death, and your father put a button on the back door. And the first night he turned it, he laid awhile thinkin', and then says he, 'If there's only a wooden button between me and death, I guess I'll trust in the Lord and not the button.' So he went down stairs and turned it back again. What a lot of hair you have got, Lindy, and how quick you braid it!"

When Pete crept up to the house at 10, the women had been soundly asleep for two hours. He tried the kitchen window; it had no fastening, and went up noiselessly. He stepped in and stood trembling. The clock in the next room ticked with appalling loudness. His knees smote together, but it required as much courage now to flee as to remain. Perhaps for ten minutes—perhaps hours, judging by his own exaggerated reckoning—he stood in fear; and then, as the clock ticked on steadily as if it had no reference to him, his heart-beats grew fainter and his courage crawled back.

He crept toward the sitting-room door on his hands and knees. There stood the old desk, with its high spindle-legs, half of it an exaggerated shadow and half thrown into light by a shaft from the moon. Probably the key was in the lock. He had seen it there himself a dozen times—had seen Frank bring in a fat roll of bills after selling his oxen, toss them in there and put down the cover without turning the key. There had been no robberies in Balburn, and so people trusted more in human nature and less in steel and wood. But the sitting-room was so light! He should never dare go in there; the very thought of having his shadow thrown on the wall, distorted like those of the tables and chairs, gave him another sickening spasm of fear. What if there were only women in the house? Suppose one appeared? where should he hide himself? He was not a thief by nature or training. He would crouch down in a corner and wait for Whettles. He had been there ages, when the clock gave warning; ages longer, and with an alarming preliminary whir it struck twelve. He started up with an after-impulse of gratitude that he had not shrieked. When had the hour before struck?! It seemed incredible that he could have slept, but it must have been so, or, what was more probable, he had been too absorbed to hear it. It was time for Whettles. He crept back to the kitchen window and waited in the cold draught of air. Minutes passed, each seeming ten. He began to grow angry. Did the fellow mean to play him false and not come at all? As anger rose, his courage to do the deed ebbed. I do not believe conscience asserted itself very strongly. Life was harder than it had been even one day before, and there was no flour in the house now. He was still bitterly at odds with life, but the after-effects of the whisky Whettles had had given him were nervousness and irresolution. The clock gave warning for another hour. False, friendly old clock, if he could have seen your face he would have known it looked ten minutes of midnight then; instead, he believed it would strike one. Too late for Whettles. Perhaps he was now at the old elm; he would hurry there and bring him back to do his share of the work. He closed the window behind him and hurried off to the rendezvous. There was no one there. At that moment the relief of having been prevented from sin overbalanced every other feeling. Something must have happened to Whettles; perhaps he had been caught; perhaps he would say that his accomplice was waiting for him under the elm! He started on a swift run for home, to find his wife waiting for him in the moonlight.

She was too thankful at finding him sober to worry at the lateness of his coming. Being a woman of tact, she did not question, but went to sleep, while Pete lay till daybreak in a cold bath of fear, expecting a rap and summons to jail at every tapping of bough or snapping of frost-bitten nail.

Whettles had lingered about Turner's, a great house over the hill, in the hope that the guests—for there was a party that night—would take their leave. But, no; the house was lighted from chambers to parlor, and sleighs came in, instead of going away. He walked up and down in the orchard, cursing himself to keep warm. Later and later, and the singing and dancing of shadows on the curtains did not cease. He would hurry over to the Poysetts' and see if the catspaw had done his work there. He stole up to the designated window as Pete had done. No one was there. He listened, and whistled softly. The clock struck 1. He had no idea it was so late. Pete must be waiting for him at the elm. And so he, too, hurried away.

But it was only a mammoth lace-work of shadow under the elm. Where was Pete? The master villain, himself puzzled, reflected a moment. Perhaps the fellow had the money and was himself hiding it at home. Lucky thought! He would go to the house and call him up, in spite of disturbing wife and children. Then if he should refuse to share! He took the road, and, passing Toppan's saloon, noticed a dim light in the bar-room. It was rather unusual that it should be there so late, but he had known it to happen before. He had just about money enough for a dram. He tapped, and then tried the door; it was unfastened, and he went in lightly. A man in a great-coat rose from his seat by the stove and swiftly, dexterously pinioned him. Toppan, himself, always on the winning side, was there ready to help, and Whettles was arrested for his last crime.

Mrs. Poysett and Linda were afoot early the next morning, putting the house in holiday trim.

"I declare if 'tain't an hour earlier 'n I thought," said Mrs. Poysett as she came down into the sitting room, where the little air-tight was already doing its ardent best. "Lindy, you didn't strike that clock 'round yesterday, after all."

"No, mother; I forgot it," laughed Linda. "I should forget my head, nowadays, if 'twasn't fastened on."

"I'll tell you what it is," said the mother, beginning to spread the breakfast-table, "I'm just about out o' patience with that clock, strikin' the hours away afore they get here. It seems malicious, tryin' to hurry you off. Now, perhaps its only half a day's job or so; let's send for Tinker Pete and have him come up and fix it."

So the chore-boy was dispatched for Pete. He came like a culprit, uncertain whether the message was feigned to cover suspicion of him or not. But no one could look into Mrs. Poysett's clear eyes for a moment, or hear Linda's laugh, with even a lingering fear that either had anything to conceal. When they described the clock's malady, I am inclined to think Pete was as near being faint with surprise as ever man was in his life, and I think he touched the worn old clock-case reverently, thanking it for keeping his deeds honest, however he had sinned in thought. He stayed to dinner, and Mrs. Poysett put up a pail of goodies for the children. On his way home he heard the news: Whettles had been arrested and taken away on an early train. Again he walked in fear and trembling; his hair grew used to standing on end in those days. He expected an interview with Nemesis concerning his intended crime, but, whether justly or unjustly, Nemesis stayed away.

The wedding? It was a very quiet one, and the happy pair went away next morning, followed by blessings and old shoes. Frank had had such an extravagantly good time in Boston that he felt he could only counterbalance it by plunging into work deeper than ever. So he began cutting the timber in the old wood lot, and hired Tinker Pete to chop there every day till spring.

"GRAN'MA AL'A'S DOES."

I want to mend my wagon,
And has to have some nails;
Just two, free will be plenty—
We're going to haul our rails;
The splendidest cob fences
We're makin' ever was!
I wis' you'd help us find 'em—
Gran'ma al'a's does.

My horse's name is Betsey;
She jump'd and broked her head;
I put her in the stable
And fed her milk and bread.
The stable's in the parlor—
We didn't make no muss;
I wis' you let it stay there—
Gran'ma al'a's does.

I's goin' to the cornfield,
To ride on Charley's plough;
I 'spect he'd like to have me,
I wants to go just now.
Oh, won't I gee up awful,
And whoa like Charley whoas!
I wis' you wouldn't bozzer—
Gran'ma never does.

I wants some bread and butter;
I's hungry worstest kind;
But Taddie mustn't have none,
'Cause she wouldn't mind.
Put plenty sugar on it;
I tell you what, I knows
It's right to put on sugar—
Gran'ma al'a's does.

FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

The Two Little Teachers.

Louis was eating his breakfast cakes one morning, when mother went to the door to see about the milk.

"Louis," she said, as she came in, "I saw a model of the suspension bridge out on the end of the front porch."

Louis had seen the Brooklyn bridge, when he was in New York, and the workmen far up and out among the wires, looking like spiders in a web, and he had quite a curiosity to see the model of such a structure. So, of course, he ran out, and papa walked along, too, to have a look at the long spider's web stretched from one post to the other, holding a drop of moisture from the fog in the center.

"That was what suggested the suspension bridge to Sir Samuel Brown," said mother, as they sat down again at table. "He was walking along his garden path one dewy morning, just like this, studying how to build a cheap bridge across the Tweed. Right across his path, as if to stop his progress, hung a little spider's rope, heavy with dew. 'Why not make a bridge like that, and hang it on ropes or chains?' he thought. The more he studied it over the plainer grew the plan, and so suspension bridges were invented, and have become such a great success. The little spider was the teacher God sent to give a lesson to the great engineer."

"Another great inventor," said papa, "learned a lesson from an insect not half so sharp as the spider. It was the poor, little ship worm that taught Sir I. Brunel how to build his Thames tunnel. He saw how the little creature, with his shield upon his head, perforated the hard wood, now in this direction and now in that, and when his track was made he covered all the sides with a kind of varnish. Copying his work on a large scale, he built a shield, under which he was able to dig into the earth under the river, and so his great tunnel was built."

Papa took from a cabinet in the room a bit of ship's timber that had been riddled by this little borer, and showed it to Louis, and pointed out the fact that, however close the walls lay to each other, they never ran into each other. It was quite a little lesson in philosophy for a seven-year-old, but the web and the specimen helped to impress it quite deeply on his memory. When he saw a spider's rope bridge ever after, he would be quite apt to think of the valuable invention which it once suggested.

A Brave Chinese Baby.

He was little more than a baby, certainly not more than three or four years old; and the queer wide clothes he wore made him look so short, at first sight, it seemed a miracle he could walk at all. He was all alone in the house; in fact he was all alone in the village. Every other house but his was shut up tight, the door locked, and all the people gone away fishing. What a predicament, to be sure, for a four-year-old boy to be left in! The more I think of it, the more I think he was one of the very bravest fellows ever born. Many a man has got a great name for being a hero without having shown half the courage that this little chap did when he toddled into the street to meet us.

It was a Chinese fishing village, on the shore of the Pacific ocean, a few miles from Monterey, in California. There are several such villages on that coast, and, to Americans, they are very curious places to see.

The door of the brave baby's house stood wide open, and, as soon as he heard the sound of our carriage wheels, he came running to see what was coming. We stopped the carriage and got out. He looked at us for a minute with a steady gaze, then turned around, and waddled back as fast as his fat little legs would carry him into the dark recesses of his house. We thought he had run away to hide. Not a bit of it. In a few seconds, back he came, holding up to us a big abalone shell, tightly grasped in both his chubby hands; then he laid it on a bench by the door, waddled back, got another, brought it out and laid it down; then still another.

In all the houses in the fishing villages there are great baskets of these abalone shells kept to sell to travelers, and the baby had, no doubt, often seen his mother bring them out and offer them to people passing by. So he thought they might be what we had come for. As he held out shell after shell toward us, he fixed his queer, narrow, slanting, little eyes on us with an expression of anxiety and inquiry that was pathetic. When he saw that we did not want the shells, he went back again, still farther into the recesses of the cabin, and, bringing out a tin dipper with a little water in it, offered that to us.

YES, MAKE THEM HAPPY.

How dear to the heart of the housekeeping woman
Are comforts of which so few architects tell;
Nice children, good servants, and plenty of room in
The well-fitted mansion in which they must dwell;
But first of the blessings kind fortune can give her,
If she in the city or country abide,
Is that which she longs for and covets forever,
The big, airy closet, her joy and her pride—
The roomy, clean closet, the well-ordered closet,
The big, airy closet, her joy and her pride.

The house may be perfect from garret to cellar,
Well lighted, well aired, with cold water and hot;
And yet to the eye of a feminine dweller,
If closetless, all is as if it were not.
How oft she has sunk like a dove that is wounded,
How oft she has secretly grumbled and sighed,
Because she saw not, though with all else surrounded,
The big, airy closet, her joy and her pride—
The roomy, clean closet, the well-ordered closet,
The big, airy closet, her joy and her pride.

Fond husbands, who fain would have home be an Eden,
For you and your Eves, all complete as a whole;
To read in, to write in, to sleep in, to feed in,
Forget not the closets so dear to the soul:
But build them in corners, in nooks, and in crannies,
Wherever a closet may harbor or hide,
And give to your Marys, your Kates and your Annies,
The big, airy closets, their joy and their pride—
The roomy, clean closets, the well-ordered closets,
The big, airy closets, their joy and their pride.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

A Distracted Young Mother.

E. W. in New York Post: "What shall I do?" writes one who signs herself a "distracted young mother." "My pretty house, once almost a model, so far as order and neatness were concerned, is exactly the reverse on account of the depredations of a boy three years old." It may be a comfort to the "distracted mother" to know that a first child in a house frequently produces these results, but it rarely happens with a second child. The mother learns through grief that very early in the baby's life he must be taught to let things alone, and I believe it is a mistaken notion to clear a room of books, bric-a-brac, etc., at the advent of a boy. A child should be accustomed to these things, and accustomed to let them alone until old enough to handle them properly. It is not too much to say that most of the true and excellent housewife's methods are developed after the manner in which Donatello gained a moral nature, through grief, if not through crime. It often occurs to me to pity a first boy instead of the young mother, on account of the experiments which are and must be tried upon him. It is possible to teach even the first baby to keep his "hands off." "Distracted mother" may wish just here to use the argumentum ad hominem and say, "Did your boy let things alone after the fashion you suggest?" And I can truthfully say that he never injured a book or tore a paper or defaced any of his mother's treasures, though of the nature and habit which made me recall Bret Harte's Lines on a Naughty Little Boy Sleeping whenever I saw him tucked up in bed at night. If the first offense is punished and an impression of wrong-doing fixed in his mind, the task of teaching will grow less and less.

Inexpensive Molds for Wax Leaves.

The following directions for making inexpensive molds, to be used for molding leaves of wax, are given by one who thoroughly understands the details of wax flower work:

Have a very smooth pine board, a foot and a half square, wash it off well with cold water, having it already clean. (This is done to dampen it.) Pin each leaf of which you wish a mold down firmly, with the under side next to the board. Now mix up some good plaster of Paris, with cold water, into a rather thick but perfectly smooth batter. Dip this batter, and pour quickly over each leaf, putting it on until half an inch thick. In half an hour you may take a pin or penknife and remove the leaf. In another hour varnish the inside of your molds with a thin varnish made of gum shellac dissolved in a little alcohol. When dry they are ready for use. When you wish to mold your leaves, have ready spool, wire and wax the shade of green of the leaf you desire to imitate. Cut off a piece of wire and wind it with a narrow strip of the green wax. Now dip your mold in water, shake off drops and lay on it a piece of wax lengthwise. Press down gently and then lay in your stem in the center. Now lay on another piece of wax and press firmly down all around. Then lift from mold with a penknife. Cut the edges in points or scallops as the natural leaf may be, using small sharp scissors first dipped in cold water. Tint the edges with a little moist carmine (oil paint) and group according to the natural flower.

A Chapter on Curtains.

There is no one thing that adds so much to the furnishing of a room as curtains. With a good carpet, nice walls, and tasty curtains, though you may have little furniture in your room, it will look quite elegant. There is no greater mistake made by people furnishing than putting all their money into a parlor set and leaving only enough to buy dark shades for their windows. Where a house is without shutters, dark shades seem a necessity; but uglier things could not have been thought of than the present fashionable shades—dark grey and brown. They make the house gloomy within, and look, outside, as if no one lived in the house.

For shades, there is nothing prettier than white, and nothing wears much better. I have some that have been in use five years, and do not look so very bad yet. The dust slips off of Holland very easily, and if the large brass rings are attached to pull them down with, they can be kept free from finger marks. But inside the shades some drapery is necessary to give a graceful appearance to the windows. These can be of Swiss, scrim, or Canton flannel as one fancies. If the windows are a north look out, Swiss could be used very well; these are pretty made to part in the center, and edged with antique or coarse torchon lace, and at the top set in large box-plaits and fastened to rings slipped on a pole. It is not necessary to purchase the heavy, expensive poles and rings at the stores, if you chose to manufacture your own. Have a pole turned at the carpenter's a little longer than the width of the window; into the end fasten a knob, which can be bought at a hardware store, together with martingale rings of iron, which can be covered with crocheting of in brown zephyr. Sew these at equal distances along your curtains, and hang them on two large hooks, which can be purchased at the hardware store. The curtains should only reach the floor; loop them back a little below the middle of the window with ribbon, and not at the window sill as formerly.

For a door, a pretty curtain is made of tarlatan, very full, gathered on a string at the top and bottom; part it in the middle, and tie back to each side with a ribbon, so that the opening forms a diamond. Inside of this have a red or white shade to draw down for privacy. A very pretty way to fix a window looking out upon an unpleasant scene, is to dissolve Epsom salts in beer until it is the consistency of cream, and put it upon the glass with a sponge. It will form the most beautiful shapes—equal to Jack Frost's paintings. This arrangement keeps out ugly sights, but does not keep out the light. If the curtains are made of Canton flannel, the trimmings should be broad bands of another contrasting color, put a foot from the top, directly across the curtain, and on a line with the window sill place another band. Nine inches, at least, in width should the bands be; line the curtains with thin cambric, and trim on the edges with worsted fringe, which comes in beautiful shades from 20 to 50 cents a yard. If you would like them more elaborate, there are beautiful strips of wool canvas, about six inches wide, to be had in all colors, which can be embroidered in any of the pretty stitches now used, and used as bands, instead of another shade of Canton flannel. These strips come for afghans, but can be used for a number of articles where stripes are employed. They are in nearly all colors, and are 50 cents a yard. Very heavy, grey linen is also used for curtains; along the edge the pattern of the linen is outlined in worsted or crewels. With the great abundance of material it is very easy in these days to make home beautiful, if one has taste; and one cannot do that with plenty of money unless they have taste. The great trouble with many homes is, there is too much mixture in them. To have everything one must have a large house; and when people learn to furnish houses according to the house we shall see more pretty homes. Furnish cottages in cottage furniture, and leave the massive style for larger houses.

Household Hints.

It is sometimes hard to decide what to have for the luncheon, which in many homes takes the place of the midday dinner. If a family is fond of oysters one need never be wholly at a loss. Here is one way to serve them: Get them in the shell; wash the shells perfectly clean, and lay them on a bed of coals; have your table spread, and on it have some thin slices of bread, some cream crackers, butter, pepper and salt, celery if in season; if not, pickles of some kind. Have the milk and water hot, ready to stir the chocolate in, so that it may go to the table delicately and freshly made with the oysters. When the oysters are done the shells will open; have ready some butter, made soft by standing on the hearth of the stove, but do not melt it; put a little lump on each oyster, and it will melt there. The upper shell should be removed, of course, but serve the oyster on the lower one. Chocolate is recommended in place of tea or coffee, as the children may be allowed to drink that.

Notwithstanding the well-authenticated fact that William Cullen Bryant ran alone at the age of one year, with no evil after consequence, the mother of the average baby had best take heed to its small ways and not let an ambitious infant stand upon its feet too soon. It is a great temptation to try a good many times a day to see just how tall the baby really is, and he or she takes such delight in pressing the small feet against something firm and unyielding that it is no wonder that a good many first babies do not have straight limbs. Baby should also not be put to rest on the same side too frequently, and it is often a good plan to turn him over gently, and he will take a longer nap than usual if this can be accomplished without waking him.

A rich cream for dessert is made of one pint of milk, three eggs, three tablespoonfuls of manioc, one cup of sugar, and a tablespoonful of vanilla. Let the milk boil, and while it is boiling stir in the manioc and the yolks of the eggs with the sugar beaten in with them. When the cream is cold stir in the vanilla—and, by the way, vanilla should never be put in any custard while it is at the boiling point, or very hot, as it loses its best qualities and is rendered almost tasteless. The whites of the eggs should be beaten to a stiff froth, and be put on the top of the cream. Beat a tablespoonful of powdered sugar with them. Put the cream in a glass dish, and serve in small saucers with a spoonful of jelly dropped in the center.

A pretty scrap bag is made by taking four pieces of Java canvas a quarter of a yard deep; cut the corners off so that the pieces shall be pointed at bottom and rounding at the top. If of blue all-wool Java, work in embroidery silk a pretty design on each piece, a fan on one, a Kate Greenaway figure on another, in bright colors, yellow and pink being especially pretty. In order to have a guide to work by, trace the design on some very thin paper, paste this to the canvas, and, after working the lines, pull the paper carefully out; then, with worsted the color of the canvas, crochet one or two rows of close work around each piece and crochet them together; finish with a cord and two tassels, and have either a ribbon to hang it by or another cord and two tassels, or a cord alone.

A suet pudding which is not too rich helps to make variety at the dinner table. Here is an excellent recipe: One cup of chopped suet, one cup of raisins, stoned and chopped, one cup of sweet milk, four cups of flour, one cup of molasses, one teaspoonful of salt, and one of soda; steam for three hours. This makes a large pudding, enough for a dozen people, and half the quantity may, of course, be used. If you have an old-fashioned cake tin with a spout in the center, it is the very best kind of dish to steam this pudding in. Serve hot, with sour or wine sauce. This pudding is good the second day after it is made, and seems even lighter after the second steaming than after the first.

Dried corn ought to be made palatable, and be frequently seen on the dinner table, but many people who like corn dislike this stuff because it is not cooked properly; it should always be put to soak in lukewarm water the afternoon of the day before it is to be eaten. Do not throw away the water in which it is soaked, or then you lose much of the best there is in the corn. Then early, at least two hours before dinner, put it in a saucepan over the fire, and let it cook slowly, but steadily, until it is tender. A little cream added to the milk, butter, pepper, and salt, are desirable, and a teaspoonful of sugar will sometimes do wonders in giving flavor to the dish.

To make an appetizing beef stew, take out the bone and bind the pieces of beef tightly, putting a lemon, pared and cut in two, and some herbs in before binding. Place it in as small a stew-pan or kettle as will allow of its being covered with water. Let it cook slowly and gently; do not add any water unless absolutely necessary. Slice a large onion and fry it brown, and add to the water also any sliced vegetables you choose; or cook the vegetables in a kettle by themselves and serve on the platter with the beef. If you do not add any water you will have very rich gravy, and a portion of it may be reserved for soup stock.

The small round stands seen in almost every sitting room are made ornamental by having a lambrequin tacked to the edge. Cover the top of the stand with crash, and crochet a lambrequin of the fish-cord so much used for various articles. Make the lambrequin just as you make the tidies, with close work and with open spaces through which ribbons are to be run. Finish with fringe from three to four inches deep. Have the lambrequin, with the fringe added, reach to where the legs of the stand join the standard.

A pretty way to cover the upper part of the back of a handsome chair is to buy a towel of fine quality, and with heavily fringed ends; tie the center of the towel with a ribbon or cord tightly so that the ends of the towel are left hanging like the ends of a necktie; put the tied center of the towel in the middle of the back of the chair, and spread the ends out, putting a bow of ribbon at the center where the towel is tied. This is a particularly good tidy for a gentleman's high-backed chair, as he may lean his head on either side without soiling the chair.

Something new in cake is devoutly desired by most housekeepers. Here it is: Bake in a large tin one cake which, when risen and baked, shall be not more than two inches deep. Take from the tin carefully, and frost thickly over the top with boiled frosting in which, directly after taking it from the stove, you have stirred English walnut meats. Chop the meats not so fine, however, that they may not be readily distinguished. Cut in pieces about two inches wide and four long. For the cake itself use any good white cake recipe. Flavor with lemon or vanilla. This is delicious.

If the carpet in your sitting room is becoming thin, and you think it will last but a short time longer, buy the new carpet now, if possible, and let the old one rest through the summer. Have it thoroughly cleaned, aired, and sunned, and then lay it away. A carpet treated in this way will sometimes bear the wear of several winters, whereas, if kept down the whole year, it will not last more than one.

An agreeable dish for dessert is made in this way: Line a deep pie-plate with rich crust, put a layer of red raspberry jam on this, and cover with a mixture made by beating three eggs, one cup of powdered sugar, a tablespoonful of butter; flavor with a very little almond extract; put this smoothly over the jam; bake till the crust is done; serve with cream.

To make a so-called oyster pie fill a shallow pudding dish with oysters, cream, pepper, salt and butter. Let them stand on the top of the stove until boiling; then cover the top of the dish with a rich crust about half an inch thick; bake until the crust is browned delicately. Serve hot. This is a delicious side dish, to be eaten with any kind of fowl or game.

A pretty tidy is made by embroidering a spray of flowers or a bird on a small square of satin; then put a band of satin around this; have it of a contrasting color; then another band outside of this, and finish with fringe. If the satin is of a bright color and of good quality, it needs no other decoration.

Presbytery of Grand Forks.

The Presbytery of Grand Forks met at Fisher, Tuesday evening, for its spring meeting, and was opened with a sermon by the Rev. N. W. Cary. Rev. J. C. Cherryholmes was elected moderator, and Rev. George S. Baskervill, clerk. This morning's session was mainly occupied with routine business. Rev. F. W. Iddings, with Rev. J. P. Schell of Euclid as alternate, was elected the ministerial delegate to the general assembly, to meet at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in May. The Presbyterial missionary reported the following items of general interest: Churches have been organized at Minto and Ardock. At Minto $1,200 was subscribed toward a church building. Bathgate is taking steps to build. Crookston has resumed work on a church to cost $3,000. In the old Presbytery of Red River, now divided into those of Pembina, Grand Forks and Red River, $50,000 has been placed in church buildings in the last three years, and during the last year $15,450 for manses and $18,500 in aid of the ministers employed. These churches have a membership of about 1,500, and have 2,000 enrolled in their Sunday schools. They have made unprecedented progress and the churches at Fergus Falls, Casselton, Mapleton, Moorhead, Fargo, Jamestown, Bismarck, Hamilton, Bathgate, Grand Forks, Ardoch, Minto and Forest River have already reached a position of self-support. The Presbytery adjourned to meet at Grand Forks in about two weeks.

Died for an Advertisement.

Paris Letter: The 18th inst. a hand-bill distributor on one of the quays lavished his hand-bills on the crowd. The hand-bills were in appearance like bank notes of 1,000f. A man who was favored with three of them examined them closely and carefully put them in his purse. A footpad watched him, followed, and at an opportune moment knocked him down, snatched the purse and made off as fast as he could go. Hue and cry were at once raised. The crowd joined in the chase. The thief, close pressed, and seeing escape impossible, leaped in the river and was drowned.

Michigan Wheat.

DETROIT, Mich., April 13.—For April the secretary of state has received official returns from 668 townships in the southern four tiers of counties, where 85 per cent of the wheat crop is grown. 15 per cent of the acreage is reported killed. Of the remainder, 17 per cent is below the condition one year ago, when wheat was in fine condition, having been injured but little during the preceding winter. The total number of bushels of wheat reported marketed in eight months, August to March, is 10,741,002; estimated amount held for market by farmers, 3,000,000 bushels. Apples promise 93 per cent and peaches 67 per cent of an average crop.

Tough Story, or Facts.

Brainerd Journal: Wm. Grimmer, of Sauk Rapids, who has just returned from some of the upper Mississippi lumber camps, reports that there are eight dead Indians, who died of small pox, now lying unburied at Caldwell's camp. He also says that seven white men who died of the same disease and were buried in the snow last winter are now exposed, the snow having melted. This latter statement seems hardly credible, however, and we think that Mr. Grimmer must have been misinformed.

DEATHLESS SONG.

You have praise for the songs I sing;
You listen with happy ear,
And you lean your heart to hear,
As the melodies rise and ring,
And tremble and swell and surge
To emotion's uttermost verge.

I say the songs are not mine:
They are parts of the mighty whole
That flows from the over-soul,
And I give them a name and sign,
And haply your heart is stirred
By the music I first have heard.

If the songs that I sing for you
Are helpful, or strong, or true,
'Tis because in some moment's grace
Mine ear has been tuned aright,
And I catch, with divine delight,
Some strain, pure, high, and strong,
Of the perfect eternal song
That fills all time and space—
Some strain from the farthest skies,
Some chord from the nearest shore,
Of the song that ever has been, and is,
And shall be for evermore.

FOR RELIGIOUS REFLECTION.

Women's Work in India.

Joseph Cook, in a recent Monday lecture, said: There are eight principal reforms that ought to be instituted at once in India: Zenana teaching by female missionaries; homes for temporary assistance to women; female medical missionaries; female schools; admission of women to university examinations; abolition of child marriages by law; a pure gospel taught to the whole community; native helpers in abundance; and new fashions set by imperial courts and by the upper classes. "A new leader of reform," he says, "has lately appeared in India, in the person of a learned young Brahmin widow, Ramabai, whose eloquence holds great audiences spellbound in Bombay and Poonah, and other important cities, as she dwells on the evils of child marriages, the education of females, the remarriage of widows, and the folly of the caste system. Since the Ganges began to roll, no such figure as Ramabai has been reflected in its waters. Japan, however, has gone further of her own impulse in the direction of education for women than any other Asiatic nation, and the reform has there the patronage of the highest persons in the court. It will not go backward. Put female education in Japan into the hands of Almighty God, and under his guidance the reform in that empire may become the day star of the amelioration of woman's condition throughout the millions of Asia. The wail of the billows of humanity in India, in the Malay peninsula, in Asia at large, especially in China; in the East Indies, in the Fiji islands, and even in the Dark Continent, may one day turn into a shout of rejoicing. Provided only that the Occident does its duty, this transition may be swift; but, if the wail goes on for a century or two more, I believe it will sound in our ears at the judgment day. We have power to send medical missionaries to these populations; we have power to send both secular and sacred education to women throughout Asia; and he who knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is a sin. Let this wail sound in the ears of sensitive women! Let it sound in the ears of strong men! Let it fill the whole sphere of Occidental Christendom, until we are aroused to make God's opinion our own as to what should be done for women in Asia, Africa and all the isles of the sea!"

Buddhism a Fraud.

Bishop Schereschiewsky, the Episcopal missionary bishop of Shanghai, China, in a recent appeal for aid in his work, combats the idea that all religions have their claims, that Christianity is merely one of many religions, and that in Buddhism especially—the prevailing religion of Eastern Asia—there is much that is good, so much that is identical with Christianity, that it were as well not to disturb this ancient religion—as perhaps those who entertain this feeling are apt to think it—and, leave "well enough alone." "For more than twenty years," he says, "I have been a student of Buddhism, I have thoroughly studied the Buddhist books—which in themselves constitute a vast literature—I have talked with hundreds of Buddhist priests and monks, Chinese, Mongolian and Thibetan; I have visited many Buddhist temples; I have even lived in such. Therefore, laying aside all mock modesty, in a matter that so closely concerns the church; I feel competent to state that a more gigantic system of fraud, superstition and idolatry than Buddhism, as it is now, has seldom been inflicted by any false religion upon mankind. It is true that Buddhism is not devoid of teachings in which there is much that is good and noble. But as a religious system it is utterly ineffectual to mold or guide the souls or the bodies of men. I am prepared to prove as well—should circumstances so permit me—that Christianity antedates Buddhism, so far as we know of the latter from its literature. My own experience has convinced me that Confucianism is much to be preferred to Buddhism and whatever we find of good among the Chinese may be traced to the influence of Confucianism. And I believe that every intelligent missionary in China will bear me out in this assertion. In the meantime I content myself with saying that the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ alone is able to save us both in soul and in body, both individually and nationally."

Religious Differences Between England and Ireland.

Boston Pilot: A great deal has been said about the unhappy effect of the religious differences between England and Ireland, as if there were some reason or excuse here for the ill-treatment of the latter country. This is nonsense. The English plunder of Ireland was begun by Catholics. The subversion of Ireland was, in the first place, a policy of Catholic England. And Catholic England of to-day, what there is of it, is as selfish, cruel and unjust to Ireland as Protestant England. The London Tablet thoroughly represents Catholic England, and it as thoroughly sympathized with Forster's policy and his attack on Parnell, as a conniver at murder and outrage, as any political Tory in England. The Tablet asserts that Mr. Parnell had "consented to profit" by criminal associations, and that his charges against the English government for picking and packing juries in Ireland were "atrocious." On another page will be found Mr. Parnell's amendment to the address from the crown, in which he enumerates the dreadful conditions of life in Ireland under the coercion law at present in force. Of this amendment, our Catholic contemporary, the Tablet, says: "We are ready to bear with political extravagance and to oppose an unending patience to political malice, but this wanton attempt to weaken the hands of justice at the moment when it is beginning to get the upper hand in its long struggle with crime, seems outside the pale of pardon." The fact is, when a robber wants to hold his plunder, he will do it with the same disregard of truth and justice whether he be Catholic or Protestant. So long as England holds Ireland in thrall for her own selfish interests, and simply because she is stronger, she will lie and misrepresent to justify herself.

Religious Awakening in Russia.

Religious Herald: While nihilism has been threatening Russia with social chaos, there has been quietly going on a deeply interesting religious awakening among the peasants, especially in the southern part of the empire, that betokens good. The name given to the subjects of this religious movement is Stundists. That is, they are prayer-meeting persons. They meet to read the scriptures, sing gospel hymns and pray. A town where the Stundists have established themselves is distinguished from other Russian towns by its cleanliness and thrift, the diminution of drunkenness, the prompt payment of public taxes, the industry, frugality and honesty of the people. No threat of noble or magistrate, no pressure of necessity, no tears of wife or children, no prospect of certain ruin, could keep a peasant from indulging in drunkenness. But what none of these things could do has been accomplished by the grace of God through the instrumentality of these prayer meetings. And not in the south of Russia, but in St. Petersburg and in Northern Ural, these evangelical meetings have been established. The priests of the Greek churches and their adherents oppose them fiercely, but still the work goes on. This is the bow of promise in the storm cloud that overhangs Russia.

Droppings from the Sanctuary.

The Congregationalist gives some correspondence that recently took place between a Western home missionary superintendent and a young man just ordained who was looking for a position. He was invited to take charge of a mission field, when he would be assured of a salary of $800 a year. He looked over the field, and, seeing that there would be some hard work to do, declined to go. The missionary very properly rebuked this spirit, and tells him plainly that he is not truly called to the ministry. A young man in any calling in life must be willing to begin at the foot of the ladder if he expects to succeed. And there is no good reason why the clerical calling should be exempt from this wholesome rule.

—Great preparations are being made throughout Germany for the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of Luther's birth, the 10th of November next. Several statues are to be erected. Preparations are being made for the publication on a grand scale of a complete edition of his works. At Eisleben, Luther's birthplace, the day is to be commemorated by the inauguration of a statue—a monumental image of the great reformer. Emperor William and the crown prince have both, it is understood, promised to be present. The unveiling is to be done by the venerable chief of united Germany, the most prominent representative of Continental Protestantism.

According to the Rev. Dr. Robinson of Providence, R. I., the Baptists have made wonderful progress since 1830. There are 2,350,000 communicants. Of these two-thirds are in the Southern States. In these States they have twelve educational institutions, with 2,151 pupils, paying liberally for their education. In the Northern States, according to the same authority, the Baptists number 775,000.

The mission of the American Presbyterian board in Japan reports the following statistics: Present adult membership of its churches, 988; additions during the year, 224; male missionaries, 10; female missionaries, 13; stations, 4; organized churches, 16; ordained preachers and pastors, 5.

INWARDNESS OF THE PARK PLAN.

One of the Company Tells of the Trials and Semi-Triumphs of the Yellowstone Park Improvement Company—Uncle Rufus Hatch's Connection.

A gentleman intimately connected with the National Park Improvement syndicate, from its inception to date, was interviewed yesterday as to the past of the company, and requested to clear up some matters which have heretofore been but partially elucidated. Numerous questions were put, the answers to which will be found in the appended abstract of his statements, which have all the weight possible to be given by the utterances of one thoroughly on the inside:

I have been and am greatly surprised at the hostility shown by a large portion of the press of the Northwest to a plan the fulfillment of which would only redound to the advantage of Minnesota, Dakota and Montana, and my surprise is the greater knowing, as I do, that the opposition started with the Union Pacific, and was intended to be directly inimical to the road of the Northwest—the Northern Pacific. Senator Vest has been attorney for the Union Pacific for years, and Representative Valentine of Colorado, who was the first opponent of the lease in congress, is also in the employ of the Union Pacific. I have this from fellow members of congress. Vest and Valentine were simply earning their fees. Now, much has been said about Secretary Joslyn's part in the matter. Let me explain this. In the early summer of 1882, Mr. Hobart of the Northern Pacific and myself went to Washington to see Secretary Teller, who had been in office but a short time. I was known to him, Hobart was not, and Mr. Windom went with us to the interior department to vouch for our responsibility—only that and nothing more. Then and subsequently Mr. Windom's interest in the scheme begun and ended with the interest he showed us as constituents. We laid the outline of our plans before Secretary Teller, and though evidently impressed with it he was offish at first and finally referred us to Assistant Secretary Bell. The latter gentleman studied the details carefully and

PRONOUNCED THE PLAN ADMIRABLE.

He said he would recommend it to Mr. Teller as fair, honorable and excellent, and as he then knew that his term of office was drawing to a close his recommendation was removed from any suspicion of interested motives. He said the department was besieged with applications for park privileges from irresponsible parties, and he was glad to favor a plan which left the government arbiter of the destinies of the park. His recommendation was made to Mr. Teller, and that gentleman, after further examination, notified us that if we would come to Washington he would sign the lease. We asked when, and he said at any time. We went on at once—in July, 1882—but Mr. Teller had been called to Colorado. He had left instructions with Assistant Secretary Joslyn, however, to sign the contract on behalf of the government, which he did, as directed by his superior. That was all Joslyn had to do with it, other than expressing his belief that the plan was a meritorious one. Now for the plan itself. It was, in brief, an agreement on the part of responsible gentlemen to put improvements to the value of $1,000,000 into the park for the benefit and accommodation of the public. The government retained an absolute sovereignty. The company bound themselves to furnish hotels and other accommodations at such points as the government directed, to establish and maintain stages and other means of transportation, livery, etc.; to hire and provide a suitable corps of guides; to build telegraph lines which were to be used gratis by the government. A portion of the men in the employ of the company were to be held at the disposal of the government to aid in keeping the peace and protecting all objects of interest and curiosity—to assist the governmental constabulary; in fact, there was an absolute provision that not a single obstruction should be placed in the way of visitors affecting one single object of interest. All fees and perquisites of any conceivable sort were stringently prohibited. The schedule of prices charged was to be submitted to the secretary of the interior, and when approved by him printed and conspicuously posted. A violation of a single specification of the contract—the collection of an unauthorized nickel from a visitor—rendered void the whole lease and made the improvements liable to confiscation. The plans of the hotels had to be approved by the secretary, and, in short, the government was left in absolute and incontestable control. Private persons were not to be prevented in any manner from coming into the park with their own horses and vehicles, camping out if they wanted to, and living there for all time if they felt so disposed. Then, beside all this, the company were to pay an annual rental to the government of $2 per acre for all land used. Competition was debarred in the original lease, for, of course, the company didn't want to spend $1,000,000 and then meet with competition from Tom, Dick and Harry. The cutting of timber and establishment of a saw mill to provide lumber for building improvements was also permitted, but the public was absolutely protected in all its rights, and extortion was rendered absolutely impossible.

PROTECTION OF GAME.

As to game, the company were the very first to memorialize the secretary, asking that he recommend the passage of a stringent law prohibiting the killing of any game—except clawed and predatory animals—within the limits of the park. It was manifestly to our interest to protect all the objects of interest in the park, the game among them, and thus add to its attractiveness as a resort. It was the intention of the company to make the park a model for the world—a place where all could come and be entertained at moderate rates, and in the best manner possible. I want to speak of Rufus Hatch's connection with the company. He was never thought of at first; but when he was West on the Northern Pacific Mr. Hobart met him accidentally and chanced to tell him of the plan. Mr. Hatch became very enthusiastic over it at once and said he would secure the money. He regarded the honor of the presidency of the company, afterwards accorded him, as a very great one, and was desirous of enlisting many prominent men in the scheme—Conkling, Merrick and scores of other prominent citizens of the republic of all parties and classes North and South. He thought it might be made a cosmopolitan as well as national, and determined to secure participants among the great ones of Europe. Had the original scheme been carried into effect this summer would have seen a perfect rush of the titled and wealthy to the park, and the Northwest would have been by so much the gainer. Mr. Hatch. It is only fair to him to say, did not expect pecuniary gain in any way and his purpose was to distribute the goodly portion of his stock to the permanent ones referred to. But the determined opposition met with from the Union Pacific road, and its paid attorneys crippled the plan sadly. We will yet achieve success, I believe, but not, I fear, as soon, or to the standard originally proposed.

SHORN OF ITS GREATNESS.

Through the efforts of its enemies the original plan has been curtailed. An amendment was attached which allowed the taking of but ten acres within the park. It was the intention to thus debar us from erecting more than one hotel, but we have gotten over that by dividing the ten acres into seven different sites. It doesn't give us room for stables, etc., but Secretary Teller says go ahead and put our stables and buildings where we must, and the department will protect us. Much valuable time has been lost, however, and we will only be able to complete one hotel—that at the Mammoth springs—this season. I forgot to mention that among our opponents were army officers, many of whom are bitterly opposed to the opening of the park to the people. They have long regarded the place as a sort of military preserve and under the old condition of things the military were about the only ones who had any chance to get in or out comfortably. But the case is by no means hopeless. I have private advices that Mr. Hatch, who is now on the Atlantic en route to New York, has succeeded in placing abroad the $1,000,000 in bonds to be issued. All of this money will not be needed at once, but it will be forthcoming when needed. There is one more matter to speak of. The talk about our transforming the park into a cattle ranch was the sheerest nonsense. When the plans for the improvements had been perfected, the question arose: "What shall we do with the small army of men and horses, which can be of no use in the park scarcely three months in the year?" Mr. Hatch, who has been largely and successfully interested in the raising of Texas cattle, at once said we could utilize the men caring for herds to be pastured in Montana, and not on land within 100 miles of the park. The suggestion was eminently feasible, was adopted, and that's all there is to that.

CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA.

The English papers say that many Englishmen are coming to the United States with money to invest, a fact that may be largely explained by the unsettled condition of Great Britain.

A grand jury at St. Louis has raised its voice against church raffles, but raffles which had no church or charity benefit in view were advertised under their very noses while they were in session.

The steamship agents say that the rush of Americans to Europe will begin earlier than ever this year, and that accommodations already engaged for months ahead indicate that the number of tourists will be unusually large.

The wheat crop of Oregon and the Territory of Washington at present promises to be the largest ever harvested in the Pacific Northwest. Reliable estimates place the exportable surplus for the ensuing season of 1883 at 300,000 tons or 10,000,000 bushels. The increase in acreage in Eastern Oregon and Washington will be about 30 per cent., while that of the Willamette Valley will be 15 per cent.

The tax on matches will cease on July 1, and after that date the price of these exceedingly useful and necessary articles should be reduced at least by the amount of the tax ($1.36 per gross). In some countries matches are sold at thirty cents a gross. It is no secret that the continuance of the heavy tax of $1.36 has been the cause of creating a monopoly in the business, only firms with abundant means being able to carry it on, so much ready money being required for the stamps. So it may be that with the relief which the repeal of the tax will afford, smaller concerns may feel encouraged to go on with the manufacture.

Despite all the obstacles and discouragements encountered down on the Isthmus of Panama, M. de Lesseps the enterprising Frenchman, is full of enthusiasm over his canal scheme and insists that it will be completed in 1888. Lieut. Rogers, of the United States navy, who recently passed over the line of the canal and examined the general plans, its construction and prospects, says there can no longer be doubts as to the intention of the company to carry out the proposed plan of this canal and that he has entire faith in the success of the undertaking. The present superior agent, Capt. Richier, believes that the canal can be made for the amount estimated—600,000,000 francs but Lieut. Rodgers infers from conversation with canal engineers and with others well versed in affairs that the canal will not be finished for some years later than 1888, and that the cost will largely exceed the estimate.

There has been quite a revival in English opera in London, and a correspondent says that "the day may not be far distant when it will seem as absurd to sing in Italian at Covent Garden theater as it would to sing in English at the San Carlo theater in Naples." The success of Gilbert & Sullivan's opera's is due to a considerable extent, to the fact, that English is the vehicle of expression, and it is believed that a good company like the Boston Ideals, who would start out to give "Martha," "Fra Diavolo," "Norma," and others of the old Italian operas in good English dress, would meet with great success in this country. At present the apparent delight in the Italian opera is the veriest counterfeit in the world. It is simply fashionable and those who want to be considered what they really are not, must vociferously applaud what is a bore to nine-tenths of those who witness its representations. No better evidence of the truth of this statement is required than that immediate enlivenment in an audience upon the introduction singing in English, whether operatic music or simple and popular ballads.

The snobbery of money is obvious to everybody. It pervades almost every locality to a greater or less extent. It is no more conspicous among millionaires than among tens of thousands whom the accident of fortune has placed in comparative independence. But a new species of snobbery has arisen—the snobbery of "culture"—or what passes for culture. Its possessors are not always rich, and frequently are deficient in practical common sense, which is not nearly as common as many people suppose—but they are often musical, have a smattering of French, affect high art, adore etchings, can draw a little, paint plates and saucers, are enthused with the Italian opera, and are up in the little conventionalties and etiquette of what is termed society. This class, in many respects, is more offensive than moneyed snobs, and is getting more numerous as educational advantages are getting more common. It is almost invariably sycophantic to the rich, while it contemns and sneers at the rich and poor alike, who do not possess, certain accomplishments, of but little practical value. The cultured snob has reached the west, and his antics among his followers, are a source of amusement mingled with pity and wholesome contempt.

A Sensational Scene at a Funeral.

Washington Special: The Rev. Dr. Blanchard, of Wheaton, Ill., created a curious sensation here recently while officiating at a funeral. A. M. Ford, who was a member of many secret societies, died. His father was greatly opposed to secret societies, and is a member of the National Christian association, whose object is to destroy secret societies. Ford had threatened to disinherit his daughter-in-law if she permitted the secret societies to bury him. As she would have been utterly destitute without his aid, she acceded to the request, and Blanchard was asked by the father to officiate. He commenced a tirade against secret societies, and speedily drove the crushed widow into hysterics, and was soon forced to discontinue his sermon and leave the church by the indignant denunciations of the audience. The service was concluded by the regular pastor. Mr. Blanchard afterward stated that he was the candidate of his association for the presidency, but that he might retire in favor of ex-Senator Pomeroy of Kansas.

NEWS CONDENSED.

Gossip from Washington.

Surgeon General Hamilton, of the marine hospital service has returned to Washington after an extended tour of inspection throughout the South, during which he spent several days at Charleston, S. C. It had been asserted that the quarantine regulations had not been enforced at that place, and that there was danger of a yellow fever epidemic. Dr. Hamilton by personal observation and investigation quickly discovered that there was no foundation for such a report, and he gave it as his opinion that there was not a healthier city on the Atlantic coast than Charleston.

Secetary Folger has gone to New York owing, it is said, to the illness of his daughter, who has been visiting friends in the vicinity of the city. The secretary has never acted since Judge French was first appointed some weeks ago, when it was understood that Mr. Folger would take a sea voyage. His trip to New York now has nothing to do, however, with the proposed sea voyage, which will probably never be taken.

Gen. Crook, who has been down in Mexico to consult with the Mexican military officers regarding action against the Indians, considers the situation serious. He says no reports of what Mexican troops have done have been allowed to gain publicity, but they have killed a good many Apaches, and have not spared women or children. Gen. Crook does not believe the Indians can be successfully fought with regular troops. He will, therefore, employ Indian scouts, to which the Mexican authorities have assented, and will permit our scouts to cross the border in pursuit of hostiles.

To judge from the declaration made by the star route defendants, they not only expect a hung jury but some of the principal defendants intend to spend the rest of their days suing the newspapers for libel. It is believed to be a fact that Dorsey and Brady are planning to sue the New York Times. The damage is placed at $500,000. Dorsey says he will spend a good deal of money to punish the Times, while Brady expects that the government will in some way foot his bills.

Twenty-four days says a Washington correspondent, will be taken up by the arguments of the various lawyers in the star route trial, the attorney-general coming in at the close with an argument only one day long, while Ker, who starts the music, is allowed five. If the court and the jury—especially the juryman who is dying of cancer—survive, there will be a verdict.

Gen. Hazen says that the published report that fears are entertained for the safety of Lieut. Greeley's party at Lady Franklin bay are without foundation. The station there has been permanently abandoned, and the relief expedition which will be sent next summer is for the purpose of bringing back the party, and is in accordance with Lieut Greeley's programme.

Commissioner McFarland, of the general land office, has received information of fraudulent land entries in Michigan. They are reported to be quite extensive, and are located principally in the Marquette district. An investigation will be made by the department through one of its special agents.

Postmasters commissioned: William C. Trahern, Elm Lake, Wis.; Ole R. Gauper, Purdy, Wis.; Chauncy K. Baxter, Rockland, Wis.; Lyman Hazeltine, Rock Bridge, Wis.; John Rustad, Kindred, Dak.; Millard F. Bailey, Bloomington, Dak.; Adelbert E. Lapham, Roanoake, Dak.

The money for the improvement of rivers and harbors, appropriated in the great bill about which there was so much public disturbance of mind, is all being applied to the various works, with one exception. The warrant has been drawn even for the famous Cheesequak creek.

Attorney General Brewster estimates the cost of the star route trials at $622,000. Enoch Totten says it cost Dorsey and Brady $100,000 each to go through the first trial.

Rail and River News.

Articles of incorporation of the Lake Superior, Willmar & Dakota railway have filed at the Minnesota capital. The line of the road is to extend on some point on the Northern Pacific road as near as possible to the city of St. Cloud, through Willmar and Granite Falls, to the west line of the state, with a branch from some point on the main line west of Granite Falls in a northwesterly direction to the west line of the state in Lac que Parle county, and the principal offices of the company are to be located at Willmar. The time of commencement of said corporation is to be April 13, 1883, and exetnd for a period of fifty years. The capital stock is placed at $1,250,000, which may be increased to $3,000,000 at the discretion of the board of directors and the names and places of residence of the incorporators are John M. Spicer, John Paulson, Albert E. Rice, Andrew Larson, B. T. Jenness H. R. Gale, Lars. O. Thorpe, Andrew Railson, George H. Perkins, Paul H. Beise and H. T. Dale, all of Willmar; and Dennis O'Brien, Kandiyohi, Louis Larson, New London; and W. R. Gillis, Tontoria, Ohio.

For some time past the stock of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba road has been steadily advancing. This advance is said to be due to the fact that the company intended shortly to issue a large amount of bonds for distribution among the stockholders of the company. The bonds will be issued May 1, and after Monday next the stock will be sold ex-dividend. According to the rumors upon the street, each holder of 100 shares of the company's stock is to receive $5,000 of these bonds, for which he is to pay $500 cash. This distribution will be equivalent to a dividend of 45 per cent. The stock of the company during last week has been quoted as follows: Monday, 161½-5 Tuesday, 160, Wednesday 161, Thursday 163½-2 Friday 164⅞-8.

It is said that the earnings of the St. Paul thus far this month are the largest ever known for the corresponding time; also that the business ahead indicates that the April earnings this year will be the largest in the history of the road. The total earnings of the sixty-two Western roads for the month of March were $23,199,386, an increase of $3,663,588 over the same month in 1882. The gross earnings of these roads from Jan. 1 to March 31 were $64,770,757, being an increase of $6,659,424. The net increase is $5,673,819.

Advice from Morton, Minn., say that Superintendent Ryder of Minneapolis & St. Louis road has been in that town preparing for the commencement of work upon the extension of his road to Redwood Falls. The probabilities are that the work will begin at an early date and pushed forward so as to have the new line opened for the fall crops.

Summary of General News.

Crimes and Criminals.

In Kansas, a posse led by deputy United States Marshal Hollister, surrounded a party of Texas horse thieves, seven miles south of the state line, below Hunnewell, and, demanding their surrender, were fired upon. The officers returned the fire, killing Samuel Ross outright and wounding James Ross, after which the father of the boys, old man Ross, surrendered. The two prisoners and dead man were brought in. The party consisted of six men, but three of them were out of camp and not captured. The horses in their possession were stolen from J. W. Herrea and others of Clay county, Tex.

The Tewksbury investigation has been resumed at Boston, and further details of abuses at the almshouse elicited from the witnesses. John F. McGovern, tanner at Woburn, said the skin of a negro untanned was brought to the tannery by W. F. Morrison, who wanted it tanned. Morrison said it was brought from Harvard, and that it came originally from Tewksbury. Morrison claimed to be a student. Pieces of skin were shown, and Brown asked for a bit of it, which the governor cut off and gave him.

While the coroner and jury were investigating the lynching of Coops and Smith, near Helena, men came out from Helena with an attachment to serve on the stock of one of the dead men for a debt of about $100 owing to a firm in Helena—principally for whisky, it is understood. These men drove off the dead man's cattle for debt while he was still hanging by the neck to a tree about 150 yards of home.

Foreign News Summary.

Jeanings' London Cable: Brady's trial for the murder of Burke was remarkable for the absecence of the usual Irish imputations of unfair conduct. Nobody asserts that the jury was packed, the witnesses perjured, the crown counsel unfair, or the judge partial. Justice O'Brien almost compelled Dr. Webb, a very eminent barrister, to undertake the defense. Dr. Webb did his utmost in the defense of anything but creditable testimony, to attempt to prove an alibi, but wholly broke down. Other defense there was none. Brady's presence on the scene of the murder was proved by three witnesses independently of the informers, and he will be hanged punctually on Whit Monday, with general approval.

The society for the relief of distressed foreigners gave its annual banquet in London, recently. Minister Lowell presided, and in an eloquent speech proposed the health of the queen, on behalf of himself and American people. He emphasized the all-embracing nature of the society, which only asked distressed strangers two questions: "Do you need help? Do you deserve it?" Three thousand two hundred and six pounds were subscribed in aid of the society.

An effort is making to renew the strike of the Irish police. A circular has been addressed from Belfast to all stations, exhorting men to strike, and urging justification by the long delay of the commission in publishing the result of the inquiry into the grievances of the men, and not adjusted. The castle authorities have issued a circular appealing to men not to act rashly, and promising that the conclusions of the commissioners will be published immediately.

On March 27 a revolutionary party, headed by Bayer, Bozelais and Gen. Barlow, with 103 men well equipped with Winchester twelve shooters, took the town of Miragoane, Hayti, without opposition. Barlow calmed the fears of the inhabitants of the town and many of them joined his forces. He then fortified the place against an attack from government forces, but none had been made at last accounts.

The Irish National league treasurer acknowledges the receipt from Australia of £5,000. The secretary has received a letter from Redmond agitating the question of Irish wrongs in Australia. It says the developments of the Phœnix Park murder are doing the league much injury and interferes with his success.

A new church bill, it is said, will be submitted to the diet at Berlin, removing restrictions on the celebration of mass and administration of the sacraments. It is declared also that no such bill is contemplated, although Bismark may have privately favored granting liberty of worship.

At the trial of the nihilists in St. Petersburg, one prisoner, Boreisha, turned informer. No reporters are admitted. One of the accused stated that work on the mine in Little Garden street continued night and day.

John Walsh, recently arrested by the French authorities at the request of the British government on suspicion, of being concerned in the Phœnix park murders, arrived in New York recently.

A committee of the bundersrath has reported favorably on a letter by Bismarck, in which he advises that the importation of hog products from America be prohibited.

Three gunboats are cruising near Cork to intercept a vessel from America having a consignment of infernal machines.

An Insane Bridegroom.

A fortnight ago one of the wealthies merchants of Moorhead, H. G. Finkle, surprised the community by marrying the lady of his choice early in the morning and posting off to Chicago by the next train for a wedding trip. It is learned that Mr. Finkle went insane while in Chicago, showing great violence, and was with great difficulty induced by his wife to return homeward. At St. Paul he was quieter, but as he and his wife were passing out of the city, bound for Moorhead, Mr. Finkle jumped off the train, leaving his wife to go on home alone. During the day he wandered to Minneapolis where friends succeeded in placing him in confinement and telegraphed for W. H. Davy, S. G. Comstock and other friends of Mr. Finkle in Moorhead, who came the next day and took the unfortunate man home. Since then M. Finkle has been under close surveillance and is said to be improving. The local papers have carefully suppressed the facts in the case, but it has made the greatest sensation in the cities of Fargo and Moorhead, where Mr. Finkle is well and favorably known. He is one of the heaviest retail and wholesale merchants of the Red River Valley, has a large fortune and some of the finest blooded horses in the Northwest. He has been at the "Cross" since the Northern Pacific went by in 1871.

Cyclone at Zumbro Falls, Minn.

A cyclone struck Zumbro Falls, Minnesota on Friday night, 13th inst., totally wrecking the following named structures: A new bridge which cost the county about $5,000, the previous one having also been destroyed by a hurricane; Andrew Schrader's barn; John W. Dale's wagon shop, and a contiguous blacksmith shop; E. A. Haradon's store, in which the postoffice was located. The front windows of Sugg's were smashed, and the kitchen unroofed. From Suggs' to the river the fronts of the houses on both sides of the street were crushed in. The store of Dr. H. N. Sogers was badly damaged, and the goods somewhat injured; so also J. Carr's restaurant and Hyde's hall. The school house of district No. 92 was unroofed, and moved some five feet from its foundation. A wagon box was blown from Dale's shop through the side of Haradon's house, smashing nearly everything in the room, and Mrs. Haradon was slightly injured by a cupboard falling on her. Moving north, the storm played havoc with some stacks on the farm of N. C. Radabaugh, and moved from its foundation a new building on the old Radabaugh homestead.

Conversion of Sitting Bull.

Milwaukee, Wis. Special: Recently Bishop Marty, of Dakota, who is spending a few days in the city, the guest of Archbishop Heiss, imparted the information that he had succeeded in converting Sitting Bull to the Catholic faith, and will receive him into the church the coming summer. The chief, with about 140 of his followers has been spending the winter at Fort Randal, on the Missouri river, midway between Yankton and Chamberlain, Dak. On the 15th inst. he will join his tribe, the Uncapapas, numbering some 4,000, in the Standing Rock reservation, on the forty-sixth parallel. The bishop had no difficulty whatever in imparting religious instructions to Sitting Bull, who never before had an opportunity to receive such teachings. Bishop Marty pronounces the chief a thorough Indian, about fifty years of age, of magnificent physique. He only speaks the Indian language and the bishop characterizes the many stories published, concerning Sitting Bull's education, etc., as mere fables, etc.

Why Gen. Butler Has No Hope.

A letter is published from Gov. Ben Butler in which he says:

I think a little examination of political history will convince you that, if your flattering estimate of my love of country and the services in its behalf, already done and which I might possibly do, be correct, my nomination would be far beyond the bounds of probability, if within the limits of possibility. For thirty years both political parties have looked for their candidates to four pivotal states—New York, Illinois, Pennsylvania and Ohio, and it has been utterly useless for any man in any other state to expect a nomination, however much he might strive for it. Living in Massachusetts, I have no belief that the rule which the politicians have made for themselves in this regard during this generation will be set aside in my behalf.

SCANDINAVIAN AMERICA.

The Distribution of Immigrants from the Northern Countries and Their Descendants in the United States.

Translated from the Fædrelandet og Emigranten: The census of 1880 shows that there were then in the United States of America 440,262 persons born in the Scandinavian countries, of which 181,729 were born in Norway, 194,337 in Sweden, and 64,196 were born in Denmark. As the immigration from the Scandinavian countries has been very great in 1881 and 1882, it is a fair estimate that there are now in this country over 500,000 persons born in the Scandinavian countries. By different counts it has been proven that children born in this country of Scandinavian parents number at least as many as their parents and others born in the Scandinavian countries and now living here, so it is not too much to say that the Scandinavian population in the United States now, at least, amounts to 1,000,000, or that every fiftieth person in the United States is either born in the Scandinavian countries or is born in this country of Scandinavian parents, and, further, that every hundredth person in this country is born in the Scandinavian countries. Those born in the Scandinavion countries are divided among the States and Territories as follows:

Death of Hon. Leonard B. Hodges.

Hon. Leonard Bacon Hodges, known widely as the great "tree planter" died at his residence in St. Paul on Saturday 14th inst., from a complication of diseases, having their origin in an enfeebled condition of the digestive organs. Mr. Hodges has long been a sufferer from chronic dispepsia, and although he had been confined to his house for three weeks, and to his bed for two-thirds of that time, his symptoms did not take on an alarming character until the latter part of last week. His death, therefore, came somewhat unexpectedly, and was a shock to the community at large, as well as to his family and more immediate friends. The deceased was in many respects a remarkable man, and his faithful and intelligent devotion to the cause of aboriculture, and his vigorous accuracy of the same by tongue and pen, placed him in the front of the sanatarians and economists of the age.

He was the founder and soul of the forestry association, and his contributions to the literature of forestry, and especially in the manual prepared by him, are, prehaps, of more practical value than all the volumes which have been written on the subject by others. He was the real auther of the timber culture act, and he inspired and moulded most of the state legislation on the subject. He originated the system of planting trees as windbreaks along the cuts of railroads, which are found to be vastly more effective than fences to protect the cuts from snow blockades. He was employed in this capacity on the Northern Pacific railroad at the time of his death. He first saw the light of day in West Blomfield, Ontario county, N. Y., where he was born upon the 15th of July, 1823. His father was Dr. Lewis L. Hodges, who was a physician and surgeon in the war of 1812. His mother, Sarah Dunham Bacon was a sister of Leonard Bacon D. descended. When only thirteen years old, Leonard B. Hodges left his home and set out to face the world. He first went to New Haven, Conn., where he found employment as a clerk in a book store and afterward other employment. Then he took up civil engineering and followed it for sometime, residing at Rockford, Ill., Allamakee county, Iowa, and at Oronoco, Olmsted Co., Minnesota. In the year 1870, Mr. Hodges, who had still continued to work his farm, became a candidate for the state senate upon an anti-monopoly platform.

Mr. Hodges came to St. Paul in 1872. His zeal for forestry now began to manifest itself, and from the time he came to the day of his death his efforts to plant in the minds of state and municipal authorities and of the people at large a realization of the importance of the subject in which he was so greatly interested was unremitting and fruitful in practical results.

He had a kind heart, and liberality was among his prominent traits. Mr. Hodges was twice married. His first wife, Elizabeth Collins, of Iowa, to whom he was married in January, 1849, died the following June. Miss Margaret B. Rogers of Saratoga county, New York, was his second wife. He was married to her on the 27th of August, 1855. Of the four children who were the fruit of this union, only one survives, namely: Margaret Elizabeth, who is now nineteen years of age.

The Giantess of the Amazons.

A giantess, Marian Wedde by name, is being exhibited in Manchester, Eng. Prior to the burning of the Alhambra Theater, London, Marian appeared at the house as the leader of a troop of Amazons, and she is now styled the Giant Amazon Queen. She is eight feet two inches in height, and as she is only 17 years of age she may attain still greater proportions. It is stated that since she came to England in July of last year she has grown four inches. Marian is of German nationality, having been born at Benkendorf, in Germany, on the 31st of January, 1866. Her parents are persons of ordinary stature, and although her brothers and sisters are tall, none of them are much over six feet. Marian appears well proportioned, is stated to be in perfect health, and to be well educated and intelligent.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

Sabin's Bread Upon the Water Returning.

Washington, Special.—The Sunday Herald says: "The physicians, some of whom were army and navy officers, now in Washington, who went from here last June to attend the meeting of the American Medical association in St. Paul, Minn., recall with great pleasure the elegant entertainment given by Mr. Sabin, now senator-elect from that state, when he invited all the delegates to the convention and the ladies accompanying them, fully 1,000 persons in all, to an excursion. They were conveyed to the lake on a special train of palace cars, and then taken on three steamboats, on each of which was a band of music and a beautiful banquet, including champagne. The tables were set as handsomely as if in a private house. When the excursion on the lake was over, at nightfall the large party was landed at Stillwater and driven in carriages over a road covered with Excelsior shavings to prevent dust, to Mr. Sabin's elegant home whose grounds were lighted with electricity and decorated and provided with pavillions and tents. There again there was music, and an al fresco banquet served with as much care for details as if each table was set for a dinner party in-doors. The same evening all were taken to St. Paul in the same manner as they had come thence."

Outrage in Wabasha County.

Plainview News: Last Saturday night a band of robbers entered the house of Mr. Bonny, a man nearly eighty years old and living alone on his farm near this place, and rousing the old man from sleep bound his hands, tied a handkerchief over his mouth, threw him on the floor and piled the bedclothes on him. In pulling off the bedclothes they discovered an old tobacco box containing five $20 gold pieces, which they at once appropriated. They then left one of their number to guard the old man and the others proceeded to overhaul the premises. They found another horde of about $150 secreted in a feed barrel. This they took, and then left the place. After the robbery it seems that some of the gang came up to Fairwater mills and stole a horse from Mr. Jones of that place. They rode the horse nearly to this place, abandoning him near the Sylvester farm.

County Text Book Agents Commissions.

Superintendent Kiehle, replying to a communication from Harold Stevenson, auditor of Kandiyohi county, asking from what fund and in what manner the 8 per cent. commission to county text book agents is to be paid, has written as follows:

The law provides that it shall be paid out of the county school tax, or the 1 mill tax, as it is commonly called. The tax is held by the county treasurer in a common fund, and is distributed at settlement by the auditor. The 8 per cent. commissions are paid by the treasurer out of the fund, and at the settlement the remainder is credited to the districts. Making an estimate upon the sold last year, if the sales were equally distributed, the commission would average about 1 per cent. of the mill tax, or about 75c. from each district of the state.

A man at Brown's Valley has bought a piece of property, a portion of which is set down as a public park, upon the plat filed in the register's office, but still there is no evidence that it was ever dedicated as a park, though no taxes have been paid upon it. He desires to cut this "park" up into house lots. The register does not know what to do in the matter, and has written to the attorney general's department to find out. The reply will be that the party must pay all back taxes upon the "park" before he can file a plat of lots. If it is shown that the property was dedicated as a park, however, he has no right to cut it up into house lots at all.

At a prayer meeting in Spencer Brook, a brother, confessed that he had stolen timber from the railway lands, but would never do so again. The following day two of the farmers present at the meeting had occasion to cross over the railroad company's land, and who should they find but their praying brother and his son engaged in carrying away all the timber they could lay their hands on.

Ex-Judge Grove B. Cooley, of Minneapolis, is dangerously ill.

Capt. Cool and C. M. McCarthy have been chosen by the land leaguers of St. Paul, delegates to a convention at Philadelphia.

Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Fowler of Browns Valley, celebrated their golden wedding last week.

A creamery is being built at St. Charles, Winona county. One is also being built at Tracy, Lyon county.

Daniel Verdt of Inver Grove, Dakota county, was fined $50 and costs, amounting to $165, for beating his wife.

The next land sale at St. Cloud will probably occur in August.

Mr. Fritsche of Lafayette sold thirteen steers for the snug little sum of $700.70.

Recently by the breaking of a brake beam three cars containing live stock were thrown from the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba track at St. Cloud.

Nicholas Frangler, aged thirteen, left his home at Long Lake March 4 to go to school and has not since been seen. It is feared that he broke through the ice in the lake and was drowned.

The Cascade manufacturing company at Cascade mills on the Cannon river in Goodhue and Dakota counties, organized for the purpose of carrying on a general milling business, have filed articles with the secretary of state. The capital stock is $25,000, and the incorporators are Daniel E. Akin, Farmington; David Orr, Northfield; E. Lockwood, Northfield, and E. S. Drake, Cascade, Goodhue county. The Clayton manufacturing company of Wadena, organized for the purpose of doing a general machine shop and foundry business, with a capital stock of $5,000, also filed incorporating articles. Articles were also filed incorporating the Benson creamery company with a capital stock of $5,000.

The Moorhead jury probably took the will for the deed in the case of Tolef Hansen, who tried to kill his wife, and acquitted him.

The property of the broken Washburn bank at Herman has been attached by the county. On Monday Messrs. Washburn and Webster executed a deed of assignment of all their property both real and personal to Dr. Chesney of Norcross for the benefit of all their creditors.

There are three candidates under the shadows of Judge McKolvey's ermine. They are Mr. Mason, an attorney at Fergus Falls; United States District Attorney, D. B. Searle of St. Cloud, and Capt. Collins of the same place.

The Le Sueur Sentinel will appear in a new dress a couple of weeks hence.

The funeral of the late Senator McLaughlin took place at Kasson Friday.

At Blooming Prairie, Saturday, a cyclone struck the eastern portion of the village, smashing B. Lester's barn and a corn crib and partly unroofing H. W. Pratt & Co.'s elevator, while it tore away the front of an old store building belonging to M. Guthrie. Total damage, about $600.

The heavy blow at Rochester on Friday, did little damage in the city. News comes of the destructive effects of the wind about two miles east of the city. On the farm of W. L. Brackenridge, the hay sheds, fences, windmill and outbuildings are completely demolished, and a hog house which he had just completed, is a total wreck. On the next farm adjoining, owned by C. H. Chadbourn, and occupied by Jacob Hetzel, the house, a story and a half frame building, with wing, was moved five and one-half feet from its foundation and badly shattered by flying debris. The wind mill was dismantled and outbuildings demolished. E. B. Jordan's windmill was also blown down. On the farm of S. G. Whiting, about two miles north of the city, the house and barn were both unroofed, and outbuildings destroyed.

The Peril of Dark Parlors.

From the Philadelphia Times.

The acquittal of Dukes is only a new and more striking evidence of the failure of the jury system. The crime itself is of far more serious import. It reveals an alarming danger in the very woof of our social life. This was no vulgar crime, the natural outcome of the criminal surroundings. The criminal was a member of the bar, in good standing, a member-elect of the legislature of this great Commonwealth. He invaded, betrayed and traduced a family who were honorable, industrious respected members of society; a family who might almost have been cited as representative of the purest and best American life.

What is it that makes such actions and allegations possible in respectable American society? A pungent newspaper paragraphist gave one of the phenomena of this new social development when he declared the moral of the Dukes affair to be no more courting in dark parlors.

The freedom allowed to our girls is in some respect admirable; it develops character, self-reliance and perhaps a certain fearless innocence; but this commendable freedom is quite compatible with a certain amount of guidance and control on the part of parents. It is not the innocent freedom of intercourse between young girls and young men which is at fault here; it is something deeper than this; it is the premature relaxing of authority and guidance on the part of parents and guardians.

It is useless to assume that independence fits these young people to solve, without guidance, the problem of their social relations. Boys and girls who could fully foresee the consequences of such apparently innocent pastimes as cigarette-smoking, drinking with comrades, flirting in dark parlors, etc., would be unendurable monstrosities. What is the use of the sad experience which brings wisdom to parents, if it is not to serve them in guiding their offspring? It is said that the constantly changing social status in this country renders parents unfit for such guidance, but it is one of the redeeming features of all such moral problems that they are the same in all social conditions. The rules of societies may differ, but the common sense of the mother is the same. Dark parlors for girls the streets at night for boys, are fraught with the self-same perils.

Big Fire at Menominie.

The Knapp, Stout & Co.'s mammoth warehouse with its contents was burned at Menomonie, Wis., April 14. The fire originated in the basement and made such rapid headway that only a small portion of the stock could be saved, and that in a damaged condition. The loss will reach $30,000 with insurance of $23,000 placed as follows:

Home	$5,000
Ætna	5,000
German American	5,000
North British and Mercantile	5,000
Connecticut	3,000

COMMERCIAL.

ST. PAUL.

FLOUR.—Quiet. Patents, Orange Blossom, $7; Red Cross, straights, $6.25; "Capitol" family, $5.50; Bakers', $4.50@4.75; in bbls, 25c extra; outside brands, 25@50c per bbl less, according to quality. Buckwheat flour, $5 per bbl. Rye flour, $4 per bbl. Graham, $4.75@5 per bbl.

WHEAT—A little better feeling was shown, consequent upon improved reports from other markets. Actual sales, however, were limited, there being but little demand. Bids for No. 1 hard were ½@1c better, the latter on May. Other grades unchanged. The market closed steady. Quotations: No. 1 hard, $1.08½ bid, $1.11 asked; May, $1.11 bid, $1.13 asked; No. 2 hard, $1.03 bid; No. 2, 95c bid.

CORN—Bids for No. 2 were 1c better, but the market was quiet, the demand being moderate. Stocks rather light. No. 2, 49c bid, 50c asked; May, 51c asked; new mixed, 47½c asked; rejected, 44c asked.

OATS—Prices generally stronger for spot and futures, with some inquiry shown for No. 2 mixed. Holders were firm; bids shade better than Tuesday. Stocks in elevators fair. Quotations: No. 2 mixed, 39c bid, 41c asked; April, 39c bid; May, 41c bid, 42½c asked; June, 42c asked; year, 32c bid; No. 3 mixed, 38c bid, 40c asked; No. 2 white, 40c bid, 42c asked; rejected, 39c bid. Sales: 5 cars No. 2 mixed, 40c.

RYE—Bids lower at 46c for No. 2, showing decline of 1c from Tuesday's figures. Demand nominal.

BARLEY—There was no change in the situation. Brewers still have good stocks, and consequently are slow in buying, causing continued weakness in quotations, but at unchanged figures. Receipts fair. No. 2, 65c; extra No. 3, 55c; No. 3, 43@45c, all bids.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—This staple was in fair request only at easier prices. Still millers seem unwilling to drop to meet any concessions recently asked by buyers. Local mills generally remain idle. Quoted at $6.40@6.80 for patents; $5.50@6 for straights; $5@5.40 for clears; $2@3.25 for low grades.

MILLSTUFFS—Several cars of bran sold on change at $9.75 per ton for lots in bulk. Shorts quoted at $10.75@11.25. Coarse corn meal nominal at about $1 per ton below the price of mixed feed, which was quoted at $18@19.50 on track, with a car or two going at $20. Lots f. o. b. sold for the day at a range according to quality, from $18.50@25 for extreme figures.

WHEAT—Several of samples sold at 82c, 83c, 93c and up to $1.05; No. 2 Northern at $1.00½; No. 1 hard at $1.10, with free bidding for the latter at that figure—$1.10. No. 2 hard was held at $1.07; No. 1 Northern, held at $1.07, $1.06½ bid; No. 2 sold at 97c by sample. May was offered at $1.12.

CORN—The trade was in condemned lots at 47@48c by sample. No. 2 was nominal at 50c.

OATS—The demand for No. 2 was at 39c, with sellers asking 39½@40c. Sales of rejected by sample at 37@38½c.

SEEDS—A part car of timothy brought $1.60, the quality prime.

HAY—Sales were noted at $7.25@8 per ton, the latter choice.

CHICAGO MARKET.—Flour, dull and unchanged. Wheat, strong and higher; $1.00⅞ bid April; $1.04¼@1.05¾ May; $1.07⅛@1.07¼ June; $1.07¼@1.07⅜ July. No. 2 Chicago spring, 1.00¾; No. 3 Chicago spring, 89c; No. 2 red winter, $1.05. Corn, demand active and irregular; 49½@52½c cash; 49⅛@49⅝c April; 54@54⅛c May; 55½c June; 56¼@56¾c July. Oats, quiet but firm; 41½c cash; 39c April; 42½c May; 41⅞@42c June; 41c July. Rye, firmer; 56½c. Barley, dull and nominal; 75c. Flax seed, firmer; $1.44. Pork, moderately active and higher; $18 cash and April; $18.12½@18.15 May; $18.32½@18.35 June; $18.47½@18.50 July. Lard, active and a shade higher; $11.27½@11.30 cash and April; $11.35@11.37½ May; $11.40@11.42½ June; $11.45@11.47½ July. Bulk meats, in fair demand; shoulders, $7.75; shortribs, $10.10; dc clear, $10.45. Butter, weaker; creameries, 18@29c; dairy, 13@25c. Eggs, in fair demand; 15½@16c. Whisky, steady and unchanged. Freights—Corn to Buffalo, 3½@4c. Call—Wheat, higher; advanced ⅛c for May and June, and ⅝c for July. Corn, higher; advanced ⅜c for May, June and July. Oats, irregular; declined ⅛c for May, and advanced ⅛c for July. Pork, easier and 5c lower; declined 2½c for June. Lard, firm; advanced 2½c for June. Receipts—Flour, 16,000 bbls; wheat, 23,000 bu; corn, 262,000 bu; oats, 88,000 bu; rye, 6,000 bu; barley, 18,000 bu. Shipments not quoted.

Deaths of the members of the cabinet while holding office have been rare, the last instance before the death of Postmaster General Howe being that of General Rawlins while secretary of war in 1869.

[illegible], Minn., April 9th, 1883.

Ed. Journal:—We have not forgotten you, but items are very scarce.

A few of our farmers commenced seeding to-day, and by the last of the week with favorable weather everyone will be at work. We are looking for heavy crops as every farmer had his plowing done last fall, and can get his seed in in good time, and shape.

Our school house looms up in fair proportion under the skilfull hands of Messrs. Banes & Tollefson.

The school board have ordered the new Faultless desk and seat, a thirty inch bell, a fine globe, and a sett of Kanes divesible maps and black boards, and have engaged Miss Hamington for the summers' term of school.

The new Cockle Separator works like a charm, and makes the wheat entirely free from foul stuff of any kind.

Rumor says we are to have another blacksmith shop. Well come on gentlemen, we have room and work enough for all.

Mr. Halvor Groding has his new house nearly ready for occupancy.

Mr. Sohler, of the mill firm of Sohler & Co., of this place, is a first-class mill wright. He put up the Cockle Separator in two days, fixing all the pulleys etc., in good shape. He informed us that they would put in rollers this fall.

The village is crowded with teams, and trade is lively in consequence.

Our little berg is on the route of the Lake Park and Red Lake Falls R. R., which is to be built. We hope this is not a paper road as our section demands a competing railroad.

Some of the most active men in opposing license are the very ones who violate the law, but they have become alarmed at the determination of some parties who are determined the law shall be obeyed and tell some of their customers they can only let them have bitters. Better go slow gentlemen and not violate the expressed will of the people and your own oaths of office.

Born to Mr. and Mrs. J. S. La Due on the 27th of April, a daughter.

La Due & Co., have a fine lot of furniture on hand, also a fine new stock of dry goods, boots and shoes, hats and caps.

Messrs. Dillon & Holmes, relation of Mr. J. C. Dillon, arrived from Kansal last week and will probably locate here.

Our enterprising agent of the various lines of Ocean Steamers, Mr. Jno. Holton, is doing a rushing business in sending tickets to the old country.

We regret to learn of the serious illness of Miss Annie Holton, and trust she will recover shortly.

A member of the medical fraternity in this vicinity has recently taken a very delicate and dangerous operation. Better let such things alone Dr. until you cut your eye teeth.

Snow is going off very gradually and as there is not much frost in the ground will sink down, making the prospect for crops better, and less danger from high water.

Come over and see us gentlemen, when you want any good farm lands. Some choice tracts for sale.

We shall send you in more subscribers for your paluable paper.

More anon. J.

The American Agriculturist for May is an unusually bright and instructive number of this most valuable Farm, Garden and Household Journal. Among the leading contributors are: W. W. Meech, Propagation of Quinces (4 cuts;) H. A. Haigh, Drainage Rights; Orange Judd, Hard Coal, etc.; Dr. C. W. Dabney; Ground Phosphates; Col. F. D. Curtis, Profit in Pig Feeding; Dr. Geo. Thurber, Plants, Fruits and Flowers, etc.; J. W. Darrow, Mutton Sheep; Prof. C. H. Peck, Bladder Plums; D. Z. Evans, Jr., The Pear Orchard; Dr. B. D. Halsted, various short papers, etc.; Isabel Smithson, The May Queen. The full-page Engravings by Geo. R. Halm and other noted artists are: "First Pledge of Blithesome May;" "Fishing in Many Waters:" "Auvergne Peasants," and "The May Queen." There are Prize Plans, fully illustrated, of a Cattle Barn and of a Piggery, several labor-saving devices, and engravings of plants and flowers. The suggestions for Farm and Garden work are most timely and valuable. The whole thirty-five pages of editorial matter are replete with solid, seasonable information, and made most attractive and instructive with nearly a Hundred Engravings. Orange Judd Co., Publishers, 751 Broadway, N. Y. $1.50 per year; single numbers 15 cents.

The Spring number of Ehrichs' Fashion Quarterly more than fulfills the promise of its predecessors. Within the compass of its one hundred and twenty pages, it sets before its readers an absolutely complete epitome of the fashions of the coming season in ladies' wearing apparel and fabrics of every kind; and this, not in the shape of a series of vague generalities, such as the ordinary fashion journal too often contents itself with, but by means of a succession of clearly written descriptions of actual articles, each accompanied with an engraving of the thing described, and all arranged in so orderly and methodical a manner that any desired information can be referred to without difficulty. Over sixty new designs for ladies' and children's dresses are illustrated and described, together with a large number of trimmed hats, light spring wraps, and other articles for the adornment of the outer woman. A new feature of the Magazine is the introduction of fashions in men's clothing, a large variety of stylish looking and economical suits being illustrated and described.

The literary features of the magazine also deserve their need of praise. Margaret Eytinge, Josephine Pollard, Eben E. Rexford, and other well-known writers are represented by tales, sketches, and poems. An interesting article on "Household Decoration" is contributed by Mrs. E. V. Battey of the New York Sun, and Hope Ledyard's talk from the Easy Chair will be read with interest by mothers, far and near.

Altogether, we think the emphatic verdict pronounced by every lady reader on the present number of the Fashion Quarterly will be: "Worth its price and ten times more."

Published by Ehrich Bros., Eighth Avenue, New York, at 50 cents a year, or 15 cents a copy.

The way that Seely's Exchange is Run.

This Sample Room has been arranged for the special comfort of the citizens of Crookston and the traveling public. On entering, each gent will be asked how he likes the location, and if Seely's Exchange is not in the right place, it will be immediately changed. Drinks every minute if required, consequently no time lost. Any gent not getting his drink red hot or ice cold, or who is delayed ten seconds, will please mention the fact to the proprietor, and the barkeeper will be fired from the mouth of a cannon infront of Seely's Exchange. The barkeeper has been carefully selected to please everybody, and as a railroad reference, is far superior to Appleton's, or any other man's guide, and don't mind being dammed any more than the Red Lake River, can wait on forty gentlemen at once and give every one the best drink in the house; can answer all questions in Hebrew, Greek, Choctaw, German, Irish, or any other polite language at the same moment. Gentlemen can steal, swear, lie and drink, tell shady stories, or any other innocent amusement common in saloons. The proprietor will always be happy to hear that some other Saloon is better than his; also that some other place is kept better than his.

Seely's Exchange,
Second Street, Crookston.

A $20.00 Bible Reward.

The publishers of Rutledge's Monthly offer twelve valuable rewards in their Monthly for May, among which is the following:

We will give $20.00 in gold to the person telling us the which is the shortest chapter in the New Testament Scriptures (not the New Revision) by May 10th, 1883. Should two or more correct answers be received, the reward will be divided. The money will will be forwarded to the winner May 15th, 1883. Persons trying for the reward must send 20 cents in silver (no postage stamps taken) with their answer, for which they will receive the June Monthly, in which the name and address of the winner of the reward and the correct answer will be published, and in which several more valuable rewards will be offered. Address, Rutledge Publishing Company, Easton, Penna. [51-52]

SUBSTANTIAL

IMPROVEMENTS

IN AND ABOUT

CROOKSTON

SOME DETAILS ABOUT THE PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS ON

Sampson's Addition!

The Direct Benefits to Crookston Secured Through the Crookston

Improvement Company.

The people of Crookston, familiar with the plat of the city and the immediate vicinity, know at a glance the strip of ground directly across the river on the west, in the shape of a horse shoe, with the front part adjoining the business portion of the city of Crookston, and separated from it by the Red Lake River only. This land, some seventy or eighty acres, is surrounded on more than three sides by the river, lays high and dry, some of it over fifty feet above the river, is a natural forest with considerable valuable building timber and several thousand cords of wood, if cut down, and altogether a natural park, needing only some clearing up, and has a river frontage of over a mile and a half, and within three blocks of the post office and two blocks from the depot.

Any one familiar with the location and its exceedingly natural adaptability for residence and business, especially everything that comes under the head of manufacturing, will wonder why this has not been long ago improved and made a part of the city proper. The answer is simply because it has been isolated from the city, owing to the lack of bridge facilities whereby people from the west have been compelled to make a long detour to cross the wagon bridge east of the railroad track.

It remained for our townsman, Hon. Bernhard Sampson to solve the question and he has done it very practically, too, and in a manner that will prove very advantageous and beneficial to Crookston. Mr. Sampson is not much of a talker, but a hard and indefatigable worker, and not being in the State Legislature this past winter, he has been devoting his time to the crystalization of his plans, and these are now sufficiently advanced to justify the statement in detail.

First of all, Mr. Sampson interested some active and practical monied men from St. Paul, and the result was the formation of the "Crookston Improvement Company," of which Mr. Sampson is president. This company's capital is twenty-five thousand dollars, and are the proprietors of the property in question, which is being platted and known as "Sampson's Addition to Crookston." The Crookston Improvement Company proposes to improve the property by clearing out superfluous timber, grade streets, and guarantees a bridge across the river at the foot of Robert street, by which the center or Sampson's addition will be brought within five minutes walk of the post office. Mr. Sampson vouches for the statement that the price of lots will be within the reach of all, especially of men with limited and stated incomes, and liberal inducements will be given to all who buy with a purpose to build. The locaton is particularly favorable for the large number of railroad men who make Crookston their homes. The next move was the organization by the same parties of a Flouring Mill Co., with fifty thousand dollars working capital. The mill, 250 barrels capacity a day, will be built this season, work already begun on Sampson's Addition, directly opposite the water power. A large foundry and machine shops, the main building 60x150 feet is also secured for the same location.

Negotiations are progressing favorably for a straw paper mill, also a sash, door and blind factory and planing mill, all to be located on Sampson's Addition. Arrangements are also completed, or agreed upon, by which the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad Co., will put in a spur track, at a point on the south side of the river, to run under the bank below Mr. Sampson's residence, and follow the south and west bank of the river to a point within a block of the west end of the bridge in Sampson's addition, to facilitate the movement of freight to and from the several mills, foundry and factories.

This is in brief the outline of what the Crookston Improvement Company has accomplished, and projected during its brief existence of hardly a month, and the prime mover in the entire project from its inception has been our friend Sampson. To carry out the improvements contemplated, involves an expenditure this season of over $100,000, a great part of which will be paid out for labor and material right here and which, when completed, will give permanent employment to upwards of a hundred mechanics and laborers.

The Crookston Improvement Company is also negotiating with parties to come here and build a barrel factory to whom liberal inducements are offered. They argue, and very correctly, that here at Crookston, where water power can be had at a nominal price and where the raw material is almost on the ground in great abundance, and cheap, is the right spot to plant a barrel factory, and it is estimated that the flouring mills within a radious of fifty miles of Crookston have even now a daily requirement of over five hundred barrels and being a railroad center, with roads north, south, east and west a barrel factory could supply the market promptly, and at a considerably less price than Minneapolis factories, as the saving in freight alone would be a very respectable item on the right side of the ledger.

The plat of Sampson's addition shows the liberal and broad gauge principle of the proprietors, in wide streets, and a very large number of lots having river frontage, and from 50 to 75 feet fronts by 150 and up to 250 feet deep. The order for lumber and other material for the flour mill has already been given, and timber for the foundation is now on the ground, and work will begin as soon as practicable.

Mr. Sampson and his associates believe in taking their own medicine and that in liberal doses, in inaugurating their substantial improvements instead of laying out a paper addition and "booming" it, pocketing the proceeds, we cannot but congratulate the people of Crookston on the good example set by the Crookston Improvement Company, and it is now in order for others to step up to the front and do likewise.

No lots have yet been offered for sale but we understand from Mr. Sampson, that plats will be ready for exhibition about the 15th, when prospective purchasers will be shown the handsomest and cheapest property ever offered in Crookston. Terms of payment will be made to suit the views of the purchasers who may wish to build.

We wish to say to any man not familiar with the geography of the Great Northwest, to procure a map of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad, follow its main line northwest from St. Paul, then let your eye rest on Crookston, the county seat of Polk County, Minnesota, in the heart of the famous Red River Valley. Please note the railway center of Crookston, north to St. Vincent and Winnipeg, south to St. Paul, east to Duluth, west to the Devil's Lake and Turtle Mountain country. Observe the source in Red Lake, to the east of the Red Lake River, passing through Crookston, giving direct communication with the limitless forests and pineries around Red Lake and towards Lake Superior to the east, and Lake of the Woods to the north, and see the branch line from Crookston to St. Hilaire, on its way to the Lake of the Woods. Examine the inexhaustible rich soil of Polk County of which Crookston is the geographical center, and then give some attention to our water power. Form an acquaintance with our enterprising and progressive people, and see if Crookston does not offer substantial inducements for your abilities and capital.

County Coroner, A. Gaboury, was summoned by telephone to Gentilly on Friday last to hold an inquest on the body of a young Polander who was found drowned in the Gentilly Creek on the morning of that day. The man's name was Alex Banaraske, aged about 20 years. His only relative in this country was a brother, a small boy who is thus left alone in a strange land.

A lively racket took place at the jail on Saturday. As the jailer was making his rounds he was assaulted by John Fergusen and before he really knew whether an earthquake had happened or what the music really was he was tumbled about promiscously. Instead of pulling his little pop, the jailer grappled with the situation and Fergusen and ere Fergusen knew what had happened he was snatched bald headed and securely locked in a cell. When those fellows play Ristow for a baby or a tenderfoot they always get badly left.

NOBLE VICTIMS OF OPIUM.

A High Life Sensation, True in all Particulars Except Names.

London Life.

Very recently a rising young physician in the West End of London was summoned to attend a very urgent case. As the carriage drew up at the door, he observed that there was an awning and a carpet extending from the portal to the curb, and on reaching the hall he found that the house was thronged with people in evening dress. The messenger, speaking to a white-haired, military looking gentleman who sat alone before the fire-place, said;

"Sir Hugh, this is Dr. Fielding," and withdrew.

The gentleman addressed rose from his chair, and as he stood in the blazing light of the sea-coal fire he seemed a man in whose splendid physical presence the doctor at once recognized the person of a famous naval commander whose deeds of personal prowess in the Pacific and in the China Seas had won for him something more than a national reputation.

"Be seated, doctor," he said, pointing to a chair, "My daughter was to have been married to-day. I have sent for you because I know your reputation for the treatment of nervous diseases is very high."

"My professional skill is at your service," said the doctor.

"Your answer is frank and to the point," returned the baronet. "The marriage of my daughter has not taken place. To-day she passed from a state of vivacity and apparent happiness into one of stupor. All our efforts to arouse her have proved unavailing. In order that you may comprehend the entire situation, I shall be forced to detail some of my own and of my family history. Her mother was a native of the East Indies, I married her after a brief courtship when I was a Flag Lieutenant in the East India squadroon, many years ago. She was a daughter of a missionary who had given over his zealous ambition to convert the heathen of Burmah and gone into trade. In a short time his fortune had reached an incredible amount. There were vague rumors that the greater part of it had been gathered by transactions in opium. The young lady herself was beautiful and talented, and the sole heiress of her father's enormous wealth. Among the many suitors who came I was the successful one, and our wedding was in many respects a most remarkable affair. Our only child was born some years later, and shortly after I was ordered to an arduous service in the Corisean waters. On its completion I returned to England to find my wife broken in health and the victim of the most painful complication of disorders. It was necessary to allay her pain and to do this morphia was resorted to. She lingered on and died. Before her death she told me in a lucid moment that she had learned the use of opium in her childhood, and that, while she had never become a slave to it, she had nevertheless taken it with regularity, and she had no doubt that her illness resulted from the habit. In this view the physician who attended her concurred. Now, sir, my child appears to me to have been using some drug. I have no reason to believe that she is a slave to a habit of taking opium in any of its horrible forms, but my heart is burdened with the gravest apprehensions. Should you discover that she is, the wedding ceremony, which otherwise is only postponed, shall never take place. The bride-groom is the son of my dearest friend, and I can never permit that he shall have the prospect of a life of misery, such as mine has been the more so for the reason that there is no way to insure a life happiness for her."

They passed out through the hall, up the staircase, encountering the guests who had been bidden to the marriage feast taking their departure. Some of them gave looks of curiosity, but all of them had a word of sympathy or a pressure of the hand to bestow upon the stricken father as he passed by.

On reaching the landing, the Baronet stopped for a moment to recover his self-possession, and then gently opening a door, ushered the doctor into the patient's chamber. The sight that greeted the doctor's eyes embraced as its central feature the form of a young lady clad in a dress of white satin and lying on a bed. A bridal veil of delicate lace trailed its luxuriant length over the back of a chair, on which also hung a wreath of orange blossoms.

In a moment the man of science saw that the father's worst fears were justified. A mere glance at the swollen eyelids, whose unnatural yellow color was heightened by the dark blue veins that traversed them, showed that the young lady was not only the victim of a larger portion than she had been accustomed to take, but that the custom itself was of old standing.

"Well, Doctor," asked the baronet, anxiously, "is it opium?"

"We must first save her life," replied the doctor evasively.

Proper remedies were administered so successfully that in a few minutes the victim was aroused from the state of coma into which she had fallen, and brought to her feet. Then began the heroic treatment. She was beaten with hands, pricked with sharp points and subjected to repeated shocks from a galvanic battery, while her stomach was attacked with the most powerful emetics, and all the while she was kept walking up and down the room, despite her pleadings to be allowed to lie down and close her eyes. It took many hours before the danger passed away. Then the doctor sought the Baronet in his library, and said without preface: "Your daughter, sir, is a confirmed opium-eater; not only has she used the drug in that form, but has taken it sub-cutaneously."

"This is horrible news," moaned the father. "Can not this frightful habit be checked and finally stopped? If you can stop it, or if you think you can, relinquish your career to devote yourself, to the task, and I will give you my whole fortune; nay, even my life."

Dr. Fielding shook his head gloomily. "No," he said, "science has not done that. Even in paradise appetite reigned and ruined."

That night the doctor pored over his books and finally, as if possessed of some new impulse, he hastened to his laboratory, and selecting from its shelves a bottle, carefully measured out a portion of morphia. He was about to conduct an experiment of which he himself was to be the subject.

It does not require many months for opium to assert its sway. Within a year the subject had become a ruler, and the student was enthralled probably beyond the power of escape. Meanwhile he devoted himself to the care of the baronet's daughter, He sacrificed his own career, shunned his old associates, gave up all practice, and either passed his time by her side or in the retirement of his own rooms, dreaming in blissful, fateful sleep.

Into the morbid brain of the doctor came visions of lands in whose glorious confines a goddess dwelt and ruled. Into his heart there came a new sensation of pleasure and pain. And besotted by the drug, or wrapped in the slumber of its creation, one thought alone pulsated in his brain. He was in love with his patient. And for a time his efforts were crowned with encouraging results. Devoting all his attention to her case, he at last checked her craving for the drug, and loosened the fetters of habit, though, unfortunately, without being able to break them. The father, noticing the first results, was transported with joy, but seeing that the improvement was not permanent, became the prey of a renewed anxiety. He questioned the doctor closely. The answers gave him no satisfaction. Sad experience had given him a keen insight. One day the thought flashed upon him that the doctor himself betrayed symptoms of being an opium slave. He bluntly put the question:

"Do you take opium?",

The doctor's pallid face, his trembling nerves, his lusterless eyes, gave one answer, but the honor of the man made him pause before he opened his lips—and lied. He had been devoting so much labor and time to the study of this case, he said, that his health had felt some ill effects; but he had now become more hopeful than ever, and he felt that the future was bright with almost assured hope. He said it was clear that the father himself had become the prey of his unfortunately morbid surroundings, and that he solely needed change of air. "In short, you should go on a sea-voyage, hope for the best for your daughter, and when you return you will receive good news. I assure you that you will."

Reassured by this confident tone and manner, the baronet acted upon Dr. Fielding's suggestion. He was away for a considerable time, and, being continually advised of the rapidly progressing recovery of his child, returned at last, improved in health and full of joyous anticipations. His arrival was quite unexpected. The butler admitted him, but he pushed rapidly by and entered the room where it was indicated he would find his child. There he encountered the doctor, who was just arousing himself from an opium sleep. His daughter half awake, half reposing in an armchair, her eyes half closed, the lines of her face softening and changing as her mind swayed in the elysium of the opiate. Horror-stricken, the father dashed toward the doctor, with a look upon his face that told of murder. But at that moment nature's hand stayed him, his heart ceased to beat, his eyes closed, his form tottered and he fell to the floor. Apoplexy, brought on in the moment of wild excitement, had claimed a victim. The doctor made a feeble effort to restore him, but his vacillating mind could not grasp the necessary treatment. When the servants came in they found him by the body, gibbering idiotically. They carried him away, leaving, for the time, the beautiful victim of an incurable malady asleep in her chair.

What Stood For a Ghost.

Just as the clock in a neighboring steeple chimed the hour of 11, the door of Breemen Street Police Station was timidly pushed open and a party, with faces on which terror and fear was plainly written, hesitatingly entered. There were an old man, a woman evidently his wife, a well grown girl, a young fellow and two little boys, beyond a doubt an entire family. The man advanced to the desk and in broken English, eked out with German, he informed Lieut. Westendorf that his house was haunted, and fearing to pass the night in it he and his family wished to sleep in the station.

"Haunted?" inquiringly remarked the lieutenant, "the police have nothing to do with ghosts."

Sergeant Austin, bearing a lantern, and accompanied by a gang of reporters and the eldest son of the ghost-stricken family, proceeded to the residence. No sooner had the party fairly entered the house than a scampering of feet and a bustle were heard. The sergeant with the lantern had lagged behind, and as it was dark a shiver of nervous apprehension went through the party.

"There it is. That's one of the spr-rit!" shrieked Fred, the Scheffer son and heir, as he darted out and stood trembling on the sidewalk.

"I've often wanted to interview a ghost," said one of the reporters with an eye to business, "and I'll make the best of the opportunity." So saying he quickly closed the apartment.

The Sergeant with his light soon arrived, and an inspection was made of the room, while the hair of all present stood on end, fearful of awful, ghastly developments. Good gracious! The ghost proved to be a poor, mean, insignificant black puppy, which stood shaking in a corner of the room.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

The Merry Makers.

A satisfactory answer: "Young man," said a grave-looking gentleman, "are you prepared to die?" "I am a freight brakeman on the X. Y. & Z. road," was the prompt response.—Boston Transcript.

One of the great actors: "Yes," said Brown, "Stalker is a great actor. He is possessed of real talent." "And he hides it so perfectly!" added Fogg, in sympathetic admiration.—Boston Transcript.

Too heavy to carry: "Bah Jove!" exclaimed young Dudiboi, "the weathah is getting so mild, yer know, that I must have the ferrule taken off my cane. It's too beastly heavy for a warm day, yer know."

A tint from the art world: She had just visited the studio of an artist famous for painting interiors and she was going into raptures over this work. "Then you think him a great painter?" "Delightful! So much feeling. Such good color. His insides are just too charming for anything."—Life.

"Speed the parting guest:" Things one would rather have left unsaid. "We've had such a pleasant evening, Mr. Jones. May I beg of you to ask one of your servants to call a hansom?" "With pleasure, Mrs. Smith."—London Punch.

The first quarrel: Philip Fogy, Jr., (who has refused, after prolonged discussion, to get gaudy raiment and take his wife to the Derblune's fancy ball), morosely: I wish I had married a sensible woman. His recently-acquired spouse (to whom the said ball is for the moment much more attractive than heaven), vindictively: She wouldn't have you!—Life.

"I have made one human being happy to-day," said Fred Blanks to Bob Belt, an Austin lawyer. "Did you send a barrel of flour to a poor widow?" "No; my means do not allow me to be so extravagant, but I told an applicant for a position in the legislature that I knew he would get it." "Well, that was one of those little courtesies that casts a ray of sunshine into the troubled life of a fellow-traveler in this vale of tears, and which does not cost anything." "The mischief it didn't cost anything! I borrowed two dollars from him on the strength of it."—Texas Siftings.

A Doctor's Occupation Gone.

A good story is told of a doctor whose most profitable patient was an old lady who suffered greatly from dyspepsia, nervousness and weak kidneys. His medicines seemed to relieve her but did no permanent good. Her nephew induced a trial of Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla which benefited her so much that she dismissed the doctor. His peculiar sensitiveness caused him to give up his practice, and instead of responding to professional calls, he often merely granted "take Guysott's," which saying became proverbial in the neighborhood and a large sale for this medicine soon sprang up.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Brief Farming Notes.

If you are behind in your work, it is better to hire additional hands and rush things through than to remain behind all summer. Or do you prefer to be behind?

Maine has forty-nine cheese factories, with an average of 107 cows to each, sixty being the lowest, 500 the highest number. The total product of all these factories during the last year was 568,834 pounds of cheese, the average price received being 12 1-2 cents per pound.

President L. S. Coffin, of the Iowa Improved Stock Breeders' Association, bears this witness of effect of conference for mutual good: "The great strides made in the last decade, especially by those engaged in the fine and extending dairy work of the west, are to a great extent due to discussion and exhibition."

If salt is to be sown on wheat, spring is the right time to apply it. The usual application is about five bushels per acre. The effects usually attributed to salt sown on wheat are that it stiffens the straw, brightens the berry, tends to prevent rust and increases the yield about four or five bushels per acre.

When the escape of milk is prevented by an obstruction in the teat the opening should be freed by the use of a tube, known as a milking tube, which is carefully pushed into the teat and forces a way through the obstruction. The tube may be left in the duct and closed by a small plug, which is removed at milking-time, or the tube itself is removed and the milk drawn in the usual manner.

Good water lime or cement will make as good a floor for your milk cellar as any one could desire, and it will have no effect upon the milk, as we know from long experience. Put a good thickness of broken stone underneath, in order to have a solid foundation upon which to lay the cement, and you will have a smooth and hard floor that will last a lifetime or longer.

An excellent coop for young chickens is made as follows: Make a frame or box of boards, 2 feet by 3, close on three sides, and lathed up and down on one side; put on a sloping roof hinged at the front over the laths, which should be six inches higher than the hind part. Hang a glazed sash in the front 6 inches from the ground to leave room for the chicks to go in and out, and to prevent beating in of rain or cold winds, and fit a piece of board 6 inches wide below this to close up the coop at night and for a feeding board by day. This coop can be moved from place to place to furnish clean ground for the floor; the best floor is the ground.

To prevent the hair from falling out, try first wetting the hair at night with salt and water. Mild sage tea is also excellent. If these remedies do not effect a speedy cure, try this: Get a little bottle of brandy, and put in all the salt that that it will absorb; wet the head with this two or three times a day.

For the common sitting-room a table-spread made of Canton flannel will be useful; the border made of the figured or brocaded Canton flannel, which is a novelty in the stores just now; or you may trim it simply with a strip of cretonne.

Dr. Robert H. Bakewell condemns the common practice of keeping lights in the bedrooms of children. He says it has an injurious effect upon their nervous system. Instead of the perfect rest the optic nerves ought to have, and which nature provides for by the darkness of the night, these nerves are perpetually stimulated, and, of course, the brain and the rest of the nervous system suffer. Children thus brought up are exceedingly timid for years after on going into the dark.

If the arnica with which bruised limbs are bathed is heated, its good effects are perceptible much earlier than if it is applied while cold. If arnica is to be taken as a remedy, as so many physicians recommend, in cases of severe sprains, it should be prepared with water in this proportion: a teaspoonful of arnica in a goblet two-thirds full of water; and of this a teaspoonful is to be taken once an hour or once in two hours, as the severity of the case determines.

Cooking forms part of the regular education of young ladies in Vienna, but they do not learn the art at cooking clubs, or at public lectures, as in England and this country, and they are rarely taught in their own kitchens. It is the custom to go to some great house—that of a princess, or some very rich banker, where there are famous chefs, who give lessons in cookery. When a chef engages to cook for a nobleman he usually stipulates that he is to have the privilege of teaching a certain number of young ladies. These young ladies need not even know the mistress of the house, and they make their arrangements with the cook only,

Vetrinary Notes.

Horses' hoofs become brittle because they are too dry—possibly from a diseased condition of the feet, or from the use of grease or oil or tar, which removes the water for them. Horn should contain about 30 per cent. of water when in a healthful state. It is then elastic and will not break. Cold water will generally restore the hoofs when they become too dry. It may be applied by means of wet bandages in the day-time and in the stable by providing a puddle of clay or wet muck for the horse to stand in. All other remedies are injurious.

Calves are subject to a fatal disorder known as anthrax fever, otherwise black leg or black quarter. They are taken very suddenly, become adverse to moving, and sleepy and stupid, and die quickly. The best remedy is to give the calf one ounce of linseed-oil as soon as it seems to be ailing; after that give a teaspoonful of sulphur and one of cream of tartar in a tablespoonful of molasses. The dead calves should be buried deeply and all the sick ones kept separate from the well ones, as the disease is contagious.

Moon-blindness or recurring ophthalmia is not an uncommon disease in horses. It is constitutional, and usually ends in blindness. The first symptoms are weakness and inflammation, with running at the eye. Then a cloud gathers, which in time disappears. After a few weeks it returns, and so on, worse at each repetition until the eye is permanently clouded. The remedy is to give the horse a pound of epsom salts on the first appearance of the trouble; to bathe the eye in cold water, in a pint of which half a dram of sulphate of zinc has been dissolved. Shade the eyes with a dark green cloth drawn over the blinders so that the horse can see downward. Keep the stable darkened and quite clean and free from strong odors. While the trouble lasts blow into the eye in the evening a pinch of burned alum, and give daily one dram of saltpetre in the feed. The teeth have nothing to do with it. It is constitutional.

A horse that is hide-bound will be relieved by a dose of one pint of linseed-oil and changing the feed, giving a bran mash with a quart of linseed-oil-meal in it once a day. No corn should be given for a time until the hair is shed healthfully.

Spring Halt.

Spring halt is an affection of the nerves of the leg, or it may be of those of the loins which control the nerves of the limbs. If the animal appears tender upon the loins, this may be also due to the same cause as the nervous disorder, and that may very possibly arise from disease of the spinal meningitis. This may even cause urinary disturbances, because the whole nervous system of these organs will be involved, as well as that of the digestive organs and the limbs, by this disease, so that the treatment in such a case should be for the primary cause and not the local disorder. The treatment should be to apply mustard plaster to the loins, to purge freely by aloes, four drams, or linseed-oil, one pint, repeated, and to give one-half ounce doses of bromide of potassium daily. Swollen gums and palate in a horse indicate bad health. The treatment should be to give a dose or two of physic. A pint of linseed oil, or a pound of epsom salts, and to wash the mouth with solution of borax. Feeding too much whole cord will sometimes produce this trouble.

Kicking Cows.

We see many remedies for curing a cow of kicking while being milked. The best remedy is prevention. This can only be applied by handling the heifer while young, teaching her by gentleness and kindness that man is her friend and does not wish to harm her; but as this is not always possible, it is well to know how to prevent kicking after a cow has reached mature years. We have noticed the following remedy many times: "I tied the cow up by the head (not legs), procured a good switch (not club), and proceeded to milk, and for every kick I returned one good smart blow with the switch on the offending leg. A few kicks and blows sufficed for that time. At the next milking only three or four blows was required and at the third milking one kick and one blow was sufficient, and ever after the cow was as gentle as need be." Three important points are to be observed in the above treatment: First, uniform kindness and gentleness; second, never strike a cow for kicking when loose in the yard, or she will learn to run from you; third, only one blow for each kick. With the right kind of person and the right kind of cow, we have no doubt that the above remedy will be efficient, but there are few persons who will stand "a few kicks," and still be uniformly kind and gentle.—Breeders' Live Stock Journal.

A Story of the Late Peter Cooper.

Mr. Cooper was always a careful and prudent business man. He was strongly opposed to the methods of many merchants, who launched out into extravagant enterprises on borrowed money for which they paid exorbitant rates of interest. Once while talking about a project with an acquaintance, the latter said he would have to borrow the money for six months, paying interest at the rate of 3 per centum per month. "Why do you borrow for so short a time?" Mr. Cooper asked. "Because the brokers will not negotiate bills for longer," "Well, if you wish," said Mr. Cooper, "I will discount your note at that rate for three years." "Are you in earnest?" asked the would-be borrower. "Certainly I am. I will discount your note for $10,000 for three years at that rate. Will you do it." "Of course I will," said the merchant. "Very well," said Mr. Cooper; "just sign this note for $10,000 payable in three years, and give me your check for $800, and the transaction is complete." "But where is the money for me?" asked the astonished merchant. "You don't get any money," was the reply. "Your interest for thirty-six months, at 3 per centum per month, amounts to 108 per centum, or $10,800; therefore your check for $800 just makes us even." The force of this practical illustration of the folly of paying such an exorbitant price for the use of money was such that the merchant determined never to borrow at such ruinous rates, and he frequently used to say that nothing could have so fully convinced him as this rather humorous proposal by Mr. Cooper.

A Life Doubly Assured.

A resident of Bangor, Maine, mentions incidentally that three months ago a New England life-insurance company refused to grant him a policy on the ground that he was consumptive. "But," he adds, "thanks to the healing properties of Hales Honey of Horehound and Tar, my lungs are now perfectly sound, and I yesterday passed a medical examination, without any objection being made, and insured my life for $5,000." Preventive of Malarial Disease.

Opinion of Eminent Dr. H. R. Walton, of Annapolis, Md.

"Colden's Liquid Beef Tonic is a most excellent preparation. It is, par excellence, superior to cod-liver oil or anything I have ever used in wasted or impaired constitutions, and extremely beneficial as a preventive of malarial diseases." She Laughed and Lost.

Henceforth a young woman in Patterson's Mills, Washington county, will lead a solemn, stately life, free alike from smile or jest. A week ago she was happy in the thought of her approaching marriage; now her life is dark with regret. In a thoughtless moment she permitted, and even encouraged, her younger brother to play a joke upon her lover. The young woman and her lover spent Sunday night in talking of the future, and when the young man went to mount his horse, he was unmindful of the surroundings. Within two minutes, however, he discovered that his horse had been exchanged for a wild and vicious bullock. When the young man picked himself together with both hands and crawled out of a fence corner, he found that the young woman was laughing at at him. She will not laugh at him again, because he meets her only as a stranger. Love may be trampled upon, but it will not be ridiculed.

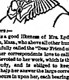
A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

From the Boston Globe.]



Messrs. Editors:—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will cure entirely the worst form of falling of the uterus, Leucorrhœa, irregular and painful Menstruation, all Ovarian Troubles, Inflammation and Ulceration, Floodings, all Displacements and the consequent spinal weakness, and is especially adapted to the Change of Life."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1. per bottle or six for $5., and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

For Kidney Complaint of either sex this compound is unsurpassed as abundant testimonials show.

"Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity.

All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others.

Philadelphia, Pa. (2) Mrs. A. M. D.

It is not necessary to enter into particulars in referring to the complicated organic and functional difficulties to which the more delicate classes of American women are subject; but we take pleasure in saying that Mrs. Lydia E. CETYWAYO INTERVIEWED.

A Monarch Who Cannot Comprehend the Celestial System.

Professor Simon Newcomb in Harper for April.

At length it was announced that the king was prepared to receive us. We followed our guide into the open air and to the front door of the house, which opened directly into one of the principal rooms. The floor and walls were rough; on the left was a long row of brown wooden chairs, and on the right, facing them sat Cetywayo, alongside a pile of wooden boxes reaching nearly to the ceiling, probably containing the personal effects which he was to transport to his native country. He shook hands with becoming gravity, and as he turned toward the rest of the party I took the opportunity to study his face. It was a purer and blacker negro face than I had anticipated, but entirely without the repulsive features of the Caffre and other tribes which supply laborers to the Cape Colony. Easy good-nature was the quality which seemed most most strongly expressed, and there was a general air of frankness about the man which explained how he had made so favorable an impression on his captors.

He was attired in a threadbare suit of blue flannel, well fitted to exhibit a physical development which any man might envy. His shirt collar seemed to have been several days absent from the laundry, and one end had broken loose from its button. Perhaps this as much as anything emphasized the contrast between the impression made by the man and what I know of his history, and made it hard to conceive that one was in the presence of a modern Attila, who was once the terror of both races through a large part of south Africa. Could this be the king, who, when the superiority of civilized weapons was first made clear to him, gave his chief officer till the grass should grow kneehigh to arm his troops with musket on pain of death or banishment?—this the man, who, when the missionary preached hell fire to him laughed to scorn the idea of a fire which his soldiers could not quench, and made good his words by setting fire to a field of dry grass, and then sending his regiment into it, who stamped it out with their naked feet!

The interpreter suggested the comet as a possible subject of interest

"Would the comet excite fear among your people?"

"No," was the reply. "My people look upon an appearance of that kind above as a sign of good fortune.

"One of the best signs of a healthy mental state you could have given," said I.

The use of the word "above" seemed suggestive of a simple trust in a superior power. So I inquired what religious ideas he entertained.

"None whatever," replied the interpreter. "He seems to have absolutely no religious feelings or beliefs."

"But what do the funeral ceremonies of the Zulus indicate?"

"They have no funeral ceremonies of any significance."

"Has he no idea of a Supreme Being?"

"Well he sometimes refers in an unintelligible way to something he calls 'the great.' But it seems to be a mere word. I can't find that he associates any definite idea with it,"

He was then told that his visitors were from America.

"We have heard of you in America," said I, thinking of that prince of Ashantee whose first question of a civilized visitor was whether they talked much about him in England.

"I have heard that America is a very large country, the other side of Europe," he replied.

Nothing in his countenance indicated that the subject of his renown in America excited any emotion whatever. The interpreter explained that the royal ideas of the figure of the earth were rather confused.

"Is it any use to tell him that Americans have come here to measure the distance of the sun by the transit of Venus?" inquired the astronomer,

"I fear there is no way to give him an idea of great distance. Even in the Transvaal all the Boers tell you of any considerable distance is that it is so many hours on horseback. But perhaps we might give him some idea by a railroad train, the speed of which he knows. How long would it be to the sun by rail?"

"Tell him that if the swiftest train were to set out to the sun with a baby, the baby would die an old man long before the train got to the sun."

When this was translated to him his hands were raised in astonishment, and wonder was unmistakably depicted in his countenance. I looked for the expression of incredulity, but saw none. To tell him of the transit was hopeless.

FEMALE HALLUCINATIONS.

Interesting Facts Cruelly Recalled Apropos of Lady Florence Dixie.

From the British Medical Journal.

Recent circumstances have directed attention to certain remarkable delusions to which females of unstable nervous equilibrium are subjected, either through hysteria or through similar disorders of the nervous system. Charcot and Bourneville give instances of the extraordinary self-deceptions that are frequent amongst hysterical patients. Dr. Legrand du Saulle, physician to the Salpetrire, Paris, describes in his standard work, "Les Hystériques," some remarkable cases of hallucination, where females labored under the belief that they have been struck or stabbed by others, even after having inflicted blows and wounds upon themselves. In one instance a young woman was found by her husband lying on the floor of her room in a fainting fit, her face covered with blood. On reviving from her swoon she stated that she had been attacked by armed men; the Paris newspapers related the case, and within three weeks two similar events occurred in the French metropolis. All these cases proved to be fabricated by the supposed victims. A young girl wounded herself slightly with a pistol. She gave the police authorities the most minute details about an imaginary assassin, who, according to her account, fired the weapon, but she was found to be highly hysterical and it was proved that she had wilfully wounded herself. In a third case in Dr. du Saull's experience, a young woman was found in a railway carriage, stabbed in the left side. The incident caused great excitement, but it was proved, contrary to her assertations, that she had inflicted the wound herself, and was a hysterical subject. A housemaid was found lying behind a door, bound, gagged and covered with bruises. She stated that she had been brutally attacked by two burglars with blackened faces, but she was a highly hysterical woman and there appears to have strong evidence that she had contrived to tie her own hands and to gag and bruise herself. Perhaps the strangest case of all occurred in Mr. Tardieu's practice. A young lady living at Courbevoie wished to make herself an object of public interest by passing as a victim of a political conspiracy, which she pretended to have discovered. One night she was found in a state of the greatest mental perturbation at the door of her apartment. She could talk, but stated in writing that she had been attacked outside her own house by a man, who had attempted to garrote her, at the same time striking her twice with a dagger. Only the lady's clothing was injured and the body of her dress and corset were found to be cut through, but at different levels. She tried to make out that the attempt at strangulation had caused dumbness. M. Tardieu remarked, in her hearing, that this infirmity rapidly disappeared when produced under circumstances of this kind. She soon managed to regain her speech, and in a short time admitted that the whole narrative had been developed out of her inner consciousness. Eccentricity in relatives is ever strongly presumptive of self-deception when a female makes any statement or charges of ill treatment of any kind. The constant fear of assassination, especially if based on reasonable grounds, is particularly liable to predispose nervous or excitable subjects to extraordinary delusions of this kind.

Youthful Dislike of Farming—Favorable Comparisons.

It is no use disguising the fact. Farm work is not popular with either the young men or young women in farmers' families. Many a farmer who is getting old sees with a vague dread of an approaching calamity the silver threads streaking his loved and faithful companion's hair, as the aged pair sit alone in the long evenings, thinking sadly of their son who is in the city, and of their daughter who is also far away. They realize, too, that new tastes and new desires and hopes have estranged their children from the farm and the homestead, the memories of which cling and twine around their own hearts and bind their affections to the place, on every foot of which there is some work or improvement done by their own hands—some tree planted, some waste reclaimed, some building arranged—and now all must go by and by into the hands of strangers who will tear down what has been built up with so much pains and has been tended with so much loving care. In thousands of farm-houses such cases as this may be met with, and they are very sad to one who knows how it is himself.

To know that one has some companions in his misery is supposed to be a consolation. If this is so, we in America may look across the Atlantic and take comfort to see the same thing going on in France, where the French farmers are mourning because their boys are abandoning their homes and becoming cooks and valets and shop men, and the girls become nurses or waitresses and stand behind the shop counters, as they do here. And German and Italian immigrants work on the farms and in the vineyards, and when the old farmers die these new-comers buy the land which the young men and women think to be below their notice.

But there is still more consolation, and that of a more solid kind, in considering the condition of English farmers and comparing them with ours. As compared with the average English farmer, an American literally and positively rolls in wealth and lives in luxury. Think of it! Here is a statement which I read in an English paper: "Large quantities of beef are used in London for making beef tea for the hospitals. The waste beef, dry and stringy as rope-yarn, and about as indigestible, has been sold for feeding pigs. But a vicar of a church in Essex writes that this beef is thought to be delicious by the farming population in his vicinity, and they are anxious to obtain it. He has made arrangements to have this beef sent from London to feed the poor creatures who would otherwise never taste meat!" We have all read of the poor young man "who filled his belly with the husks which the swine did eat." Here is a modern instance of the ancient misery. If anything could tend to make an American farmer and his children contented with their lot, in which they enjoy plenty of the very best, and don't have to work very hard for it, either, such a fact as this should do it. "But farm work is so disagreeable, so dirty; makes the hands so hard; and one must wear such coarse clothes about it." Well, every one to his taste. I would rather put a hard-skinned hand, soiled if you like, into the pocket of a pair of coarse homespun trousers and pull out a well-filled wallet, and lie down at night under my own roof, than jingle a dozen "nickles" in the barren pockets of a city-made suit and know it is all that is left after paying a week's board in a frowsy city boarding house, with nothing over my head of my own but a shiny silk hat, which has just been "ironed while you wait" for 25 cents to make it look as good as new. Solid comfort is worth a good deal, but somehow or other sentiment sometimes turns solid comfort to misery, and makes a false and barren show seem to be the very height of enjoyment.—New York Times.

George Augustus Says He Was A Fool.

G. A. Sala's "America Revisited" discourses thus gracefully and apologetically of his sayings on his first visit: "When I first went to the United States in the year 1863, I was, comparatively speaking, a young man, very prejudiced, very conceited and a great deal more ignorant and presumptuous than—I hope—I am now. When I landed in America the country was convulsed by one of the most terrible internecine struggles that history has known. I took, politically, the wrong side—that is to say, I was an ardent sympathizer with the south in her struggle against the north. In so taking a side I was neither logical nor wordly wise. In short, I approved myself to be what is commonly called a fool, but my partiality for 'Dixie's Land' was simply and solely due to a sentimental feeling, and at thirty-four years of age it is permissible to possess some slight modicum of sentimentality. My heart was with the south because I came on my mother's side of a West Indian family and a slave-owning family, ruined by the abolition of slavery in the British colonies, and although I know perfectly well that I was altogether wrong in what I wrote politically concerning "America in the Midst of War," my heart is still in the south, with her gallant sons and her beautiful daughters, and the song of 'Maryland, My Maryland' yet stirs that heart like a drum, and will not cease to stir it, I hope, until it ceases to beat for good and all."

Cunning Maine Foxes.

One morning last week, as I was crossing lots with my hound, I saw an old red fox run into a thicket. I put the dog on his track and concealed myself in the thicket, knowing that a fox will often circle and pick up his old track. I could hear the hound baying off near New Gloucester. Then it changed and grew more and more distinct, and I knew the fox was returning. I must have waited some half an hour when I saw the fox dart into a hollow log a little distance to my left, and as he went out at the other end I remained in my hiding place, supposing it a trick of the fox to put the dog off his track. The dog was puzzled only an instant and followed the fox on a longer circuit this time, but in the course of an hour I saw it again enter one end of the log and come out at the other. Thinks I, "My chap, I'll play you a Yankee trick by stopping up the other end of the log." This I did, and again hid myself waiting for a third return. I was hidden about the same length of time when by the voice of my dog, I knew the fox was returning. A few minutes later I saw the fox enter the log. I ran up to the open end and soon had it secured. This being done, I awaited the coming up of the dog, which I tied to a sapling while I went out to get an axe. I soon got back and opened the log sufficiently to see four foxes instead of one. "How was that?" "It's plain enough. One fox would run until tired, then would enter the log and another would take his place.—Lewiston Journal.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Present Condition and Prospects of the Enterprise—The Work of Digging Vigorously Begun.

Boston Advertiser.

Capt. Nathan Appleton, who has been indentified with the International Company since the time of the Paris congress which voted for the Panama route, a warm friend of M. De Lesseps, and one of the earliest to put faith in the canal enterprise, having spent a fortnight or more upon the isthmus, has just returned home to Boston. He says that to get an idea of what is doing on the canal one need only cross the isthmus upon the railroad train, from which abundant signs of the extensive progress already made can be obtained. About 6,000 men are employed. These are partly native Indians, and partly negroes from Jamaica, of whom large numbers have been brought over. Until within the last six months the work has been principally preparatory. Houses for the workmen have been erected at intervals along the line, the trees and tropical growths have been removed, and one can now ride on a horse along the ax of the canal—that is, the line which marks its exact centre from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The canal company has purchased the railroad, and the fact of there being a railroad there has proved an economy in time for canal building of several years. Miles of extra track have been laid for the excavations, large hospitals have been put up at both ends of the canal, and a vast amount of machinary has been sent to different points and put in readiness for operation. The digging of the canal has now fairly begun. At Calebra is the hights point on the line, some 3000 feet above the level of the sea. An American, Mr. Albert Millet, has the contract for excavating and removing some 3,000,000 cubic metres. His place is called the American camp, or section, from the fact that almost all his machinary was made in the United States; and its operations are watched with great interest, and even jealously, by the Frenchmen and others, who are very fast coming to recognize the superiority of American machines and American inventive talent. He has an excavator built at Albany, N. Y., digging sharply into the mountain-side, dumping into cars made in Springfield, and which are hauled by a locomotive made in Boston. From Calebra several miles toward the Pacific and ten miles or more toward the Atlantic the laborers are at work digging through this, the backbone of that part of the Andes. A contract has recently been made with an American for dredging ten miles on the Pacific end of the canal, and at the Atlantic terminus work has already begun. Two dredging machines, each with a capacity of about 1,000 cubic metres a day, are employed there. The American Dredging Company has the contract for dredging ten miles of the Atlantic end, and it will put at work there three colossal machines, one of which is now on its way there, and the other two which are now building at Philadelphia, each costing $125,000. The material that is brought up from the bottom of the canal at Colon, where these smaller dredges are at work, is pure white coral, which, when wet in its place, is cut through as easily as cheese.

The canal company is now paying out not far from $500,000 monthly on the isthmus, and another half million dollars is being spent at the Paris and New York offices for supplies and machinery of all kinds. That is, the work is being pushed ahead at the rate of a million dollars a month, and the company has sufficient money to go on on this basis for three years to come, at which time the work will be so far advanced that it will continue by its own momentum. In everything that is done, Capt. Appleton says, the inspiring mind and the controlling hand of M. De Lessop is seen. He has not only the happy faculty of choosing the right men to put in the various positions connected with the work, but of inspiring them with an enthusiasm for the work, and a personal loyalty and devotion to himself.

One matter which is of course of great interest is the sanitrry condition of the isthmus. There are on the average about 150 patients in the company's hospital at Panama, of whom only comparatively few were stricken with fever. The others were suffering from various diseases and injuries received in work. There were only thirty-five patients at the Colon Hospital. When it is considered that any of the 6,000 workmen who are taken ill are sent to one or the other of these hospitals it is apparent, Mr. Appleton says, that the isthmus is not the pestilential place it is commonly believed to be. The water from the soil is not fit to drink, and the canal company has imported hundreds of thousands of bottles of spring water which is sold cheaply.

The time has now come, says Capt. Appleton, when Americans should realize that the canal is not an imaginary affair or the company a speculative organization. It is a great reality, becoming stronger and stronger every day, and our people should take part in the work in a manner worthy of the position they occupy, geographically and politically The idle talk which has been not uncommon in congress and in the American press has had no effect in frightening the people of Central and South America, and it has not tended to increase their respect for the United States. They know that the International Company—which is only French in the sense of being organized by the great canal-digger, who happens to be a Frenchman, and having its administrative officer in Paris, while really the flag of the United States of Columbia floats over it and protects it—it is doing the work which has been the dream of travelers, of navigators, of merchants, and of statesman for many years. The statue of Columbus, sent over by the Empress Eugenie, now stands on the shore at Colon. Doubtless, some day, one will be erected to Balboa where the waves of the Pacific come up to the western extemity of the canal. Nothing could be more appropriate, when the canal shall be a finished and accomplished fact, Captain Appleton suggests, than to erect a monument to Ferdinand De Lesseps on the hill-top of Calebra, from which, in imagination, if not in fact, he could see the waters of the two oceans which it is his happy destiny to bring together as he has the Red Sea and the Mediterranean.

The late John Gray, Ada, Mich., recently deceased at the age of ninety-five, was a great-great-grandfather, and left 103 descendants.

England's total of postal areas are but about 122,000 square miles, while ours are not far from 3,500,000 square miles.

WONDERS OF THE SKY.

A suspicion of twilight still lingers in the west, the slender crescent of the new moon, only a day old, holds in her arms the old moon with an outline of remarkable distinctness, and the zodiacal light extends its cone of pale gold high up toward the zenith. The stars swarm in the dark dome arching above us, as they twinkle and glitter in the frosty air. The brightest stars, the most superb clusters that spangle the firmament, are included in the grand procession, the princely Jupiter marshaling the host. Rising from an unbroken surface of snow, and looming up in the blackness of night with ghostlike indistinctness, the huge telescope seems to pierce the skies, and dwarf to Lilliputian dimensions the observers at is base. Object-glass, eye piece and other required appurtenances are in position, and the great eye is pointed to the planet Saturn. The transformation is like a vision of fairy land, The pale star, on which, a moment since, we had looked with the unaided eye is now a creation of surpassing loveliness, the most charming telescopic object the heavens reveal. Saturn, his rings and his moons are before us. The disc, a golden sphere crossed by faint cloud-bands of a delicate creamy tint, the wonderful rings softly cradling the planet, seven of the eight moons, beaming from the dark back-ground of the sky, Titan, the largest moon, showing a perceptible disc, make up the shining picture. The coloring of the picture is exquisite. The glorious orb, its surface resplendent with liquid gold, is crossed by a central band of creamy white, and flecked with spots of delicate prismatic hues, and the rings are curiously variegated in color, the inner most being of a rich purple. The planet seems almost to stand upright within the engirdling rings, only a small portion being visible beneath them. We are fortunate in seeing him under a very favorable aspect. For his rings are opening wider, his northern declination is increasing, and he is approaching perihelion. This condition will culminate in 1885.

Jupiter is the next object to test the space-annihilating glass. Though by no means as magnificent as Saturn, he far exceeds him in mass and volume, and, as he is twice as near, we see him on a much larger scale. The giant of the system takes on grand proportions, the flood of light irradiating his surface brings out every minute detail. His broad belts are delicious in coloring, suffused with pale rose, mottled with soft gray, purple, brown and delicate green. We have seen Jupiter when the definition was much more perfect, but never with the variety of tint and tone we behold this night; never before did he seem so near, so grand in proportions, so symmetrical in equipoise. His four satellites are in line on his left, and bear witness to the power of the telescope by presenting discs instead of points. We find it difficult to decide which of the two pictures is most beautiful. Saturn is most magnificent, more complex more curious, but Jupiter is more majestic more like the great sun himself.

We have only one more view, and this is to be the great nebula of Orion. The most wonderful nebula the northern skies reveal is before us, filling the field of view, and suffused with a celestial light suggestive of the holy city that had "no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God did lighten it." The delicacy of the celestial glow pervading the scene is beautiful beyond expression. Spiral curves of nebulous haze fill in the field of vision, the radiating mass being of a delicate green tint, while dotted over the shadowy haze, and mingling with it in mysterious union, are numerous bright stars, imparting an element of life to the formless void, and helping to light up this scene of indescribable grace and grandeur, which no pencil may paint, no words describe The fascinating picture holds us spell-bound. Imagination seeks in vain to fathom this mystery of mysteries, this chaotic mass so beautifully fashioned, this lovely blending of tints of gold and delicate green, this flood of light that started from distant space hundreds of years ago, this spiral form that reveals the quickening pulse of maternal life. We feel, as we gaze upon the celestial scene, that we are standing on the threshold of the golden portal that separates the earthly from the heavenly. We have a glimpse of the glory to be revealed. [From a Providence Press report of a trial of the largest telescope in the world, It was built for the Russia government, and will soon be transported to its destination in the Pulkowa Observatory, founded by the Czar Nicholas, and overlooking the city of the czars from its lofty position on the Pulkowa Hills, nine miles south of St. Petersburg.]

Sarah Bernhardt and Her Husband.

M. Damala, the husband of Sarah Bernhardt, has written a letter to one of the Paris newspapers, announcing his retirement from the stage, and his intention of resuming his old profession of a soldier. He says it is not true that he and his wife are about to separate The rumors that they were to separate have had their foundation in his retirement from the stage. "France" he continues, "which treats my wife as a spoiled child, will, I hope, have room for me under the shadow of her flag. Being passionately fond of the stage, I deceived myself as to the possibility of at once taking a place not too unworthy of that which my wife occupies in the first rank. But notwithstanding the indulgence with which I was received, I must be more severe toward myself than the press and public have been. Reason and honor call upon me to take a manly resolution, and therefore I renounce my dream of being an actor, and resume the career of arms. This very day I enlist in the foreign legion, and solicit the favor of letters of grand naturalization." M. Damala was once a sub-lieutenant in the army of Greece.

He Couldn't Have the Body.

The Sheriff at Wyoming, was in readiness to serve a writ of habeas corpus on Detective Norris when he reached that city with his notorious prisoner "Lou" Hank, but the detective had been warned in time to circumvent the sheriff, and instead of passing through Cheyenne on the western express he hired a special train consisting of a locomotive and one car and rushed through the city at the rate of sixty miles on hour. The sheriff discovered the plan just too late to switch the special on a side track, but just in time to see it whiz past. He has since received the following exasperating dispatch from Detective Norris: "Please accept my thanks for your proffered assistance at Cheyenne. Having urgent business at Omaha, which would not permit the delay, I was compelled to hurry through and give you the go-by. Should you ever come to Ohio, I am at your service, and our latch-string hangs out."

Rev. C. H. Plummer, rector for the past ten years of St. Mark's Episcopal church of Lake City, has been granted leave of absence for one year, which he will spend with his family in Branford, Conn., where he will minister to a parish during that time. This temporary change is for the benefit of the health of himself and wife. They will start east about May 1.

Facts and Fancies.

Sala, in his "America Revisited," says of the Sunday clangor of bells: "They boom and bawl from sunrise to sunset, as though they were so many hotel gongs calling guests to theological meals."

Snow has repeatedly fallen all over southern Europe, once or twice as far south as the streets of Palermo. It is a curious fact that both in the Northern and Southern hemispheres and on the Eastern and Western continent the last twelvemonth was one of heavy snow-fall.

Twenty graduates of Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, had a reunion and dinner in San Francisco, Cal., on the evening of March 27. There are sixty-five Dartmouth men on the Pacific coast, representing classes from '43 to '75.

A South Carolina judge, in passing sentence lately, remarked that ninety-nine out of every one hundred persons upon whom he had had in his circuit to pass sentence were comparatively young people. Especially in crimes of an infamous character the criminals were in nearly every instance quite young, and almost always of the colored race. It was rare that he had to pass sentence upon those who had experienced the restraints of slavery and who had been made free.

There has been several failures of late at Winnipeg. Rents are very high, and it is said there are $4,000,000 worth of buildings under contract this spring, and, as already 2,000 emigrants have arrived, while thousands more are on the way, these failures are considered but exigencies of frontier town-building. The resent advance in the duty on agricultural implements and the increased freight rates on the Canada Pacific cause great indignation among the farmers, who as usual, when things go wrong over the border, talk about annexation.

A St. Peterburg telegram says: "A statistical report on suicides in Russia has been issued. It appears that some 2,000 persons in each year make away with themselves. The greatest number of cases occur in the district of Moscow, after which comes St. Petersburg, Warsaw, and Irdkursk. During the last five years 7,713 cases have been registered. Suicide in the Russian army, as in that of Germany, has been on the increase during the last few years.

The Lancaster New Era says that a citizen of Pennsylvania may leave $1,000 or $1,000,000 to his family, wife, or children, and the law takes no cognizance of it, but if he leaves so much as $100 to a public charity the laws of the state promptly dock the bequests five per cent.

The auction sale of season tickets for the forthcoming dramatic festival in Cincinnati has closed. Twenty-four hundred and fifty-three seats have been sold for a total sum of $64,625. Of this sum the premiums amounted to $30,283. The average premium is $12.35. The sale has produced several thousand dollars more than any previous auction for Music Hall, and there are still 1,267 seats to be sold without premium.

The development of fossil remains at the Nevada state prison quarry continues to be more and more interesting. Scarcely a blast is made which does not disclose new and strange tracks, osseous remains of fossil ivory. The vegetable indications are numerous and interesting, as are the many specimens of clams and other mullusks.

The wives of some of the most prominent men of Condersport, Pa., have formed a society in opposition to the Masonic order. They have determined to hold their meeting on the same evening as the Masons, at as late an hour, and will endeavor to reach home in the same state of set-em-up-ativeness as their lords and masters.

Teaching a Love of Money.

Something new in education has been attempted in a Western City, where the superintendent of schools has undertaken the establishment of a system of trade and finance among the pupils. The children are trained in the arts of making money, and taking care of it. They are encouraged to earn an honest penny in all possible ways—by blacking boots, selling newspapers, making small marketable articles, etc.; and they have a bank for the care and management of their accumulations. The object apparently is not that they may earn their education, but that they may be taught the value of money, the importance of thrift, and the mysteries of commerce. We are not surprised to hear that the boys take to the scheme kindly. It is said that their books are not neglected; on the contrary, increased diligence in study seems to result from the general spirit of rivalry awakened at the touch of trade. The lad who has got ahead of his companions in a mercantile transaction at half-past 8 is still in an emulous mood when he enters the class-room at 6. Altogether the schools are lively.

The children—but, God save us! are there any more children? Are these premature financiers the innocent creatures whom fathers used to take upon their knee, finding in their simple prattle refreshment of heart after the depressing contests of the busy day? Are these the models of meekness, docility, purity and trustfulness, upon whom the Master laid His sacred hands when He bade us become like little children? Bankers in round jackets, boys who have discarded "Robinson Crusoe" for the Price Current, and substituted interest tables for "The Arabian Nights," they seem to be in a fair way to imitate the lawyer in "The Battle of Life" by changing the old rule, "Do as you would be done by" into the improved modern maxim," "Do, or you will be done brown." And what terrible sharps they promise to be when they rise from the petty operations of the playground to the serious bargaining, selling, buying, lending, discounting, note-shaving, bulling, bearing, and cornering for which their instructors are now giving them such a practical preparation! They ought to be shrewd enough in a few years to get the better of a Chatham street clothing dealer.

If there is anything which American children have no need to be taught it is the importance of money-getting. That is a lesson they learn soon enough by a miserable experience. The haste to be rich is, in the opinion of most observers, our great national fault. This is the cause of our instability and recklessness in trade, our laxity of financial morals, the frequency of our embezzlements and breeches of trust, the gross dishonesty of our governments, the bold robberies of our public officers, our wild license of speculation, our vulgar taste for display, our low standard of value in all things material, intellectual and religious. And there could hardly be a more striking illustration of the base mercenary spirit which is destroying us than the fact that a superintendent of public schools thinks it a praiseworthy action to teach the love of money to children predestined by inherited taint or by national example to love it only too soon and too well.—New York Tribune.

Seven years ago Mr. Bell, of telephone fame, was a poor man. Now he is said to be worth $6,000,000.

AN APRIL MORNING.

This morning when I awoke, I heard
The low, sweet clatter of a bird
Beside my window, where so long
I've missed the music of the song
That filled last summer with delight,
And saw a sudden, arrowy flight,
A flash of blue that soar and sings,
A bit of Heaven itself on wings.

"The blue-birds has come back," I cried,
And flung the window open wide;
I leaned across the mossy sill,
And heard the laughing little rill,
That comes but once a year, and stays
Through the brief round of April days;
Then, when its banks with bloom are bright,
It seems to vanish in a night.

"PAPA'S OLD PET."

BY KATE WINDSOR.

The parlors of a private residence in the suburbs of Newton; time, 9 o'clock. Two gentlemen, evidently friends, are seated before the open grate, in which a coal fire is burning brightly. Ever and anon they lean forward in their easy chairs and extend their hands, as if to grasp more of the generous warmth which is already penetrating to every corner of the cozy apartment.

Both are well-to-do merchants of the quaint New England town in which they were born, and where they have resided all their lives. On the table by their side stands a decanter, well filled with rare old port, and an open box containing choice cigars.

"Come, fill, man!" says the host to his guest, "I don't envy the poor beggars who pass by such tipple as this. It will warm you up and give you a new lease of life."

The invitation is promptly accepted, and the action is repeated again and again. Soon their tongues are loosened, and the conversation becomes quite animated. Brilliant sallies of wit and peals of contagious laughter followed each other in quick succession, until the hour hand on the parlor clock points the hour of 12, and Richard Grant, the guest of the evening, rises hastily from his seat.

"By Jove, Percival, how time flies!" he says, "I had no idea it was so late, and I promised Mary to be home by 10 o'clock."

"That's one of the disadvantages of married life," replied the bachelor host, laughingly' "You are too convivial Grant, for a benedict."

"We'll talk about that another time," responded Mr. Grant, smiling. "Perhaps the advantages more than counterbalance the disadvantages. Anyhow, I am satisfied, Percival, and so you would be if you had as good a wife as mine."

And Richard Grant, grasping his friend's hand, wishes him "good-night," and wends his way homeward.

Ethel, the 3 year-old daughter of Mr. Grant, is dying. Already her wan little face bears a spiritual look, and her mother can no longer hide from herself the fact that death is near.

The little one has but one cry, "I want papa!" and as Mrs. Grant hears it her heart, is sad indeed. Mr. Grant is a good husband and indulgent father, but he is not what the world call a domesticated man. He knows that his child—"papa's old pet," as he is wont to call her—is on the verge of eternity. Yet so strong is his inclination for "company" that he cannot leave his friend until midnight.

So Ethel calls for papa in vain. Her mother sits by the bedside with an agonized look on her features and the hot tears coursing swiftly down her cheeks.

"Bring Teddy' mama dear."

Already the voice is becoming more feeble and tremulous. No time is to be lost, and Teddy, the baby, is held before her.

A ray of light illuminates her face as she looks lovingly on her little playmate.

"Dear Teddy!"

Suddenly, very suddenly, there comes a change.

"Oh, mamma, it is so dark—so dark!"

Mrs. Grant bends over, presses her own lips to the child's, and with a mighty effort to restrain her grief, says:

"Patience, my darling! The light is coming."

"Oh, mamma, nurse Ethel!"

The mother cannot resist the appeal. She lifts child, pillow and clothing to her lap, and awaits the end. She has not long to wait. The little face assumes a wax-like hue. Evidently the white winged messenger is near.

"By, mamma! By papa!"

A breathless silence reigns in the room. Other mothers are present, and they weep silently.

"Ethel sleep—papa—kiss!"

And Ethel sleeps—sleeps the sleep that knows no waking. Her pure spirit has gone to God who gave it, and mamma and Teddy will see her here nevermore.

* * * * * * *

"What, up still, Mary? Why did you wait for me?" Mr. Grant inquires, a touch of impatience in his voice.

"Hush, Richard! There are others in the house, and trouble has come to us."

It is 1 o'clock, and Mr. Grant has just returned, flushed with wine, and in exuberant spirits. The impress of sorrow is on his wife's features, and there is such a strange light in her eyes that he pauses to look at her?"

"What do you mean, Mary?"

"Oh, Richard, we have lost 'papa's old pet!" And Mrs Grant, unable longer to restrain her grief, flings herself in her husband's arms and weeps pitifully.

Gently disengaging himself he hastens to the chamber.

Yes, it is quite true. There before him lies the earthly shell—all that is left to him of his little darling. He is quite sober now. Then comes his wife to join him, and tell him all that has taken place.

"If you had but been here, Richard," she says, plaintively, "it would not been so hard to bear. Why did you not come?"

"Well, my dear, I met Percival, and he invited me home. We had a glass or two of wine, and conversing together the time slipped away."

"Have you never thought, Richard, how it must be for me sit here hour after hour, listening for the footsteps that seldom comes till morning?"

"No, Mary, I have not thought much about it, or perhaps I should not have neglected you."

"It is natural that you should like the companionship of your friends; but it is more natural that I and the children should have your first attention. The dear child whom God has taken from us has often cried herself to sleep calling for you."

"Say no more now, Mary. I cannot bear it. We are sorely stricken, and must help each other to bear our sorrow."

The house seemed to be deserted, although several people were moving noiselessly about. With the spirit of Ethel the sunshine had for the time departed, and the shadow of grief was present everywhere.

* * * * * * * *

"Earth to earth—ashes to ashes—dust to dust." Solemnly and with a measured cadence the words are uttered, and the pretty casket is lowered to its final resting place, canopied by an avalanche and copiously watered with the tears of affection.)

The little vine that hung so closely to the parent stem has been severed at last and Richard Grant mourns as only a father can. There are other children to claim his care, but just now his thoughts are centered on the one that is gone.

Mechanically he roams around the house, picking up a little shoe here, a sock there, a doll or a broken toy. They are all mementoes of "papa's old pet," and they open his wounds afresh.

Mrs. Grant, woman-like, endeavors to comfort her husband, but like David, he refuses to be comforted.

"It has taught me a lesson," he says. "Hereafter my first thought shall be for home. The time was, my dear, when I preferred your society to all other. I do not love you less now, but habit is second nature, and that of choosing other companionship has grown on me."

Teddy is now a big boy, and mamma's hair is silvered with gray; but Ethel is not forgotten, as the little grave in Avondale amply proves. Loving hands have enshrined it in a bower of roses, and many are the pilgrimages made to the silent city. For papa the place has a sad but peculiar charm, for, unknown to all, he has there made a vow that home shall have the first place in his heart's best love.

Reader, he kept the vow, and although he has laid other dear ones away to rest, never has a child of his repeated, in dying moments, "I want papa."

Pictures of Cairo.

Egyptian Correspondence New York Tribune.

Cairo is certainly a fascinating city, but to see it under its best aspects one must abandon donkey and driver and plunge into the narrow lanes, right or left, ask no questions, but just drive in wherever chance or fancy may direct. Here in the close courts and alleys you find the life of the Orient, and here in the densest by-ways are bazars and the minature factories that supply them. There are originally a kind of high street which ran north and south, and from this innumerable lanes have diverged, which are as crooked as the ways of evil, and redolent of all odors from frankicnense and attar to garlic. A stick is an invaluable accompaniment on all pedestrian excursions, for although foreigners are as plentiful as flies, the natives still pursue them with intolerable curiosity The raising of the stick will make a man start away several yards, and a fixed glance, even if of admiration, at some beautiful little girl will cause her to scream and fly precipitately from the evil eye of the stranger. But, if curiosity or cupidity frequently triumphs over fear, there is a deep-seated aversion in the Arab heart to all those but of his own faith. The advent of the English troops has brought trade and security into the country; and if Lord Dufferin should carry out the reforms he has planned, foreign capital and machinery will soon lighten the burdens of the people. But to this they are indifferent, and prefer their own sort of civilization and happy hunting-grounds. In many a household verses pass from hand to hand, and are hung upon the walls bemoaning the condition of the city. "O Masr (Cairo) how hast thou fallen. Weep for the fate of the beautiful pearl. Weep, let us bow our heads and weep, for strange men ride armed through the streets."

The Muski and the Boulevard Mohammed Ali have cut the old High street in twain, and monopolized the more modern shops, but the Arab trades are still carried on in the labyrinth of lanes. In one barely wide enough for two persons to pass are the shops of the silversmiths, and all the courts leading from it resounds with the furnaces and bellows of the workers in precious metals. The patterns of their goods are generally reproductions of the old Cairene, and the wily dealer has always a discolored specimen of one of these forms to pass off upon the curious traveler as genuine work of the Soudan. With the exception of articles of general consumption, the value of which is fixed, a preposterous price is in the first instance always demanded, so that shopping is an occupation of joy to the gentler sex, as in other more fashionable capitals. Squatting side by side upon the shop board, the merchant and the fair shoppers discuss their coffee, smoke their cigarets, talk scandal, and every now and then, as if by accident, return to the object of the purchase. Fifty francs is sometimes asked for an article which may be eventually obtained for five. Time seems to be of no importance to the trader; but the hurried traveler finds it a sore trial to his temper to bargain for several hours, even with the assistance of a dozen other Arabs, who drop in to advise and assist. In the courts of the mosque of Muristan Kalaun once a spacious hospital erected by a sultan of that name, the coppersmiths have established their forges, and the sound of many hammers and the voice of many tinkers now break in upon the devotions of the faithful. In a lane adjacent groups of tailors are cutting and stitching garments, embroiderers are tracing gorgeous ornaments for the running footmen, and weavers are throwing off thousands of yards of gold lace for the new mushroom Egyptian army. There are mountains of brilliantly colored Manchester goods for woman's wear; stacks of mysterious articles from the coasts of the Red Sea; labyrinths of yellow slippers, and such a wilderness of red-toed shoes that one marvels how the barefooted population will ever wear them out.

Among the noisy mass that throngs the streets the only creatures that accept Kismet in its absolute entirely are the dogs. Generally of the color of the sad desert itself, they are the most forlorn, miserable, mangy mongrels accident ever produced. With foxy heads and half-opened eyes, they lie in twos and threes in the sunniest and most inconvenient places, and when kicked out of the way or trodden under foot they make no remonstrance, but trail off to some other spot equally pleasant and inconvenient for the pedestrian. They appear utterly devoid of pluck, spirit or intention, and exhibit no emotion, except when they catch sight of a bone in the fist of an Arab munching his dinner on the sidewalk. They about half wake up then, and surround the dinner in a semi-circle, blinking at the bone in a faint sort of feeble expectancy. Indeed, there is but one thing that binds them to life, and that is to keep their beat inviolate. If a stray dog should venture into the street where he was not dragged up, he or she will be instantly assailed by the entire detachment of that street and compelled to fly or immediately become a meal. In other parts of Egypt the dog displays some of the qualities expected, but in Cairo he is too degenerate a beast to inspire sympathy and too stupid to accept it even if it were offered.

Cario is said to possess 250 mosques, a great number of them on the line of one cramped and ancient thoroughfare. The mosque of El Ahmar, with a lofty portal and a vast and graceful interior, is undergoing restoration. This has been undertaken by a council recently constituted to protect and pre-erve the public monuments, and the authorities have wisely added the antiquarian Rogers bey and 10 other Europeans to the body.

A young man died in Rome, Ga., a few days ago, after an illness of forty-eight hours, and his physician said his death was due to congestion of the lungs caused by smoking cigarettes.

Mr. Albert E. Menke, of Harvard University, has been elected professor of agriculture and agricultural chemistry in the Kentucky state college.

THE WIND BLOWS.

Hark!
The wind blows, and sleet and hail
Fast follow on the eddying gale—
The winter seething in the snows;
The sweeping storm, from height to height
Beats back the huge, devouring night;
The watchdogs bark
And the wind blows.

Hark!
The wind blows, the hills grow brown,
The snow melts, and the rain comes down,
The swollen current dips and flows;
The water foams, the bridge gives way;
By night the horseman drinks the spray;
The watchdogs bark
And the wind blows.

Hark!
The wind blows, the nights grow brief,
The savage forests burst in leaf,
The time of planting comes and goes;
The waters fall, the sand drifts down;
Suns pass, and no man thinks thereon;
The watchdogs bark
And the wind blows.

ANTOINETTE.

Our party numbered seven or eight, and, as all of us had had the honor of having been more or less robbed, sacked, ruined and broken up by the Prussians, to amuse ourselves after dinner, we enumerated our pianos which had disappeared and our clocks which had taken unto themselves wings.

"And I, also," said our friend Paul Rivet, "have lost pianos and clocks, but I can buy more pianos and I can buy more clocks, while my camellias, my poor camellias! Twenty years of toil, patience, care and adoration!—all that lost, destroyed, annihilated! And do you know what I found in the middle of my greenhouse, in the place of that delicious little marble figure which I brought from Naples? Do you know what I found? Oh! do not try to guess—you will never succeed!

"My wife, after Sedan, had shown a great deal of character. 'My love,' said she to me, 'we must stay here; we must defend our house.' I added: 'And our camellias.'

"On the 17th day of September, at 8 o'clock in the morning, one of my farmers arrived out of breath and wild with fear. 'The uhlans, monsieur,' he cried; 'they are at Corbeil and will be here in an hour!' My wife was seized with terror. She cried: 'Let us go away, my dear! I don't want to see those uhlans! Let us go away at once. Take me, take me, no matter where!' The horses were immediately harnessed to the calech and we departed.

"We left at the chateau seven or eight servants, one of whom, a little femme de chambre, Antoinette, a Parisienne, very pretty, very intelligent, very shrewd and very bold, said to me as we started: 'Have no fear, monsieur, I will receive the Prussians. I know how to talk to them, and they shall not carry off even a match.'

"The next day we reached Trouville; my wife fell seriously ill, and for a couple of weeks I was very uneasy.

"I constantly received letters from Antoinette. 'Monsieur need not be disturbed,' she wrote. 'Everything is going on splendidly here. We have had the good luck to fall into the hands of an excellent Prussian colonel and exceedingly amiable officers. Through the kindness of these gentlemen I am able to send my letters to monsieur.'

"And the gardener wrote to me: 'Monsieur ought to be very grateful to Antoinette. By a happy idea she had saved everything. I dare not say more to Monsieur, because the Prussians might read my letter; but, nevertheless, the Prussians, thanks to Antoinette, do not treat us badly.'

"About the 20th of October, my wife being completely restored to health, I packed my carpet-bag and started off. I wanted to see my camellias, and, above all, I wanted to know what was Antoinette's happy idea which had saved everything. I will spare you the details of my journey. It was original, however. It took me a week to go from Trouville to Corbeil; I was arrested three times as a Prussian spy by the French, and four times as a French spy by the Prussians. At last I reached my house, greatly agitated. I saw my broad avenue of chestnut trees and at the end of the avenue my iron gate. I crossed my court-yard, which was full of horses, army wagons, cannon, Prussian dragoons and artillerists. I mounted my front steps. I was at home—in my vestibule. The furniture, the pictures, the hangings, all were in their places. Delighted, perplexed, I stood motionless like a donkey, my carpet-bag in my hand, in the midst of five or six Prussian dragoons who were curiously examining me. One of these dragoons, a sub-officer—he had gold lace on the collar of his tunic—came up to me and said:

"'What do you want? What are you doing here?'

"What was I doing in my own house! I replied that I desired to speak with the colonel."

"'He is busy. He is at breakfast. Who are you?'

"'Mon Dieu! I am the proprietor of this mansion.'

"'Ah! the proprietor—you are the proprietor. Wait a bit. I will notify the colonel.'

"A few seconds afterward a door—one of my doors—opened and I saw advancing toward me a tall Prussian, booted, spurred, with long, grayish side whiskers, who, with both hands extended, exclaimed in excellent French:

"'Monsieur Rivet! Is it you, Monsieur Rivet?'

"'Yes, it is I!'

"'Ah! you have done well to come. How happy I am to see you!'

"And those two Prussian hands were still extended toward me, but I patriotically held my two French hands at a distance, as far off as possible, behind my back.

"'Ah! you are prejudiced,' said the colonel, bursting into a beastly and heavy laugh. 'I see how it is—you are prejudiced. Very well; you will get over your prejudices. But come along; come quickly. We are at table.'

"'But I don't want anything to eat.'

"'You don't want to breakfast with us. More prejudices! But you must come along, nevertheless, for the baronne is at table with us and will be enchanted to see you.'

"'The baronne. A baronne enchanted to see me.'

"But without listening to me, without answering me, the colonel grasped me by the arm, and, pushing me before him, made me cross my salon; then, opening the door of my dining room, he cried:

"'Madame la baronne, here is your uncle; here is Monsieur Rivet!'

"And then I saw, seated at my table, eight or ten Prussian officers, and in the midst of these officers, Antoinette—Antoinette, who had on one of my wife's velvet dresses. My wife's diamond earrings were in her ears, all my wife's rings on her fingers. My wife's necklace of black pearls was about her neck and all my wife's bracelets were clasped around her wrists. Rubies sparkled in her hair, and sapphires shone upon her corsage. Antoinette was no longer Antoinette—she was the show window of a jewelry shop!

"Antoinette, on seeing me enter, arose quickly, turned very red, and let this cry escape her: 'Monsieur; it is Monsieur!' Then, quitting the table immediately, she ran to me, threw herself violently upon my neck, and began to kiss me furiously, exclaiming: 'Ah! how happy I am to see you!' Then she renewed her kisses, whispering in my ear: 'Kiss me, kiss me very tenderly!' Of course I complied with her request, and she showered another flood of kisses upon me, the while continuing to whisper to me: 'Seem more affected than that! I am your niece; speak to me lovingly—ah! that's better—it is to save Madame's diamonds.' We went on kissing before all the Prussians. The operation, however, was not in the least disagreeable, Antoinette being a charming little person. All the officers stared at me, and had the air of saying to themselves:

"'How delightful it is to be able to kiss that pretty girl as much as you want to!'

"And, naturally this excites me!

"But, after two or three minutes consecrated to this kissing business, mingled with revelations and explanations, Antoinette took me by the hand, led me around the table, and obliged me to seat myself beside her; then, with much grace and self-possession, she presented me in turn to all my Prussian guests:

"'Monsieur the Colonel so-and-so, of the Second dragoons; Monsieur the so-and-so of the Third hussars, etc.' As for me, I was like one intoxicated, and I assure you that I must be pardoned for having remained thus seated for an hour at that table, amid all those dragoons and all those hussars. I no longer knew where I was or what was taking place around me, but nevertheless, I have preserved a very clear recollection of the extraordinary conversation which ensued, and in which, despite myself, I was compelled to participate.

"'Well, Monsieur Rivet,' said the colonel, 'I hope you will bring back Madame Rivet immediately. We lead a charming life here, as your neice will tell you. We are not at all the savages your beastly journals call us.'

"And then the colonel gave vent to a burst of the same heavy laughter which a little while before had shaken my nerves. Instantly all the officers in concert, as if obeying a command, abandoned themselves to violent hilarity. There is a lively and light gayety, which is French gayety, and there is another gayety, lumbering and brutal, which is Prussian gayety.

"'No, we are not savages,' continued the colonel, 'and you cannot condemn Madame Rivet to pass the whole winter in a hovel at the seaside—for we shall remain here the whole winter. Not on account of the siege of Paris—oh, no! Paris will be taken in five or six days—the 1st of November at the latest. But there will be, perhaps, certain difficulties about the re-establishment of the emperor.'

"'The re-establishment of the emperor?'

"'Certainly; you can readily see that, for your own interests, we shall be obliged to disembarrass you of your absurd republic. Besides, the emperor has received a good lesson; he has become reasonable; he will no more disturb the peace of Europe; while, with your republic, one could be sure of nothing. Yes, we will restore you your emperor, despite all the bawling of your beastly journals!'

"At the conclusion of this speech came another burst of laughter from the colonel, followed by another general explosion. It must be admitted that admirable discipline reigned in the German army. All those men laughed in a military fashion, in the Prussian way, as if on drill. As long as the colonel shook his sides, so long the officers, with remarkable unanimity, twisted with merriment; but all the bursts of laughter stopped short with the last burst of laughter from the colonel, as stops the roll of the drums when the drum-major lowers his staff. There were eight or ten of these rough fits of laughter while the colonel, speaking with German enthusiasm, reconstructed the map of Europe, took provinces from Austria, invaded England, etc.; but the hilarity grew absolutely furious when he began a series of jokes about the Bavarians, evidently habitual with him.

"'Ah! you are fortunate,' said he to me, 'in having to deal with Prussians—real Prussians—for we are real Prussians. Now, if you had Bavarians! What ugly things your beastly journals could say in regard to the Bavarians. Our king is too kind to permit Bavarians to fight beside us Prussians. The Bavarians should be authorized to serve only as musicians in the Prussian army. King Louis should be field marshal of all the German music, etc.'

"This odious breakfast at last came to an end. The colonel arose, dismissed his officers, and, approaching me, said: 'Now, I wish to conduct you myself to your greenhouse; I wish to show you your camellias!'

"'My camellias!'

"'Yes, yes; I know your passion. Madame la baronne had the goodness to inform me that you adore your camellias; therefore I sent for your gardener and explained to him that he would be shot, in front of the greenhouse, if he allowed a single camellia to die! That was a joke, of course; I would not have had him shot, for we are a civilized people, but I should not have hesitated to order him tied to a tree for twenty-four hours, without anything to eat or drink. That, however, has not been necessary. Your camellias are in perfect health. Come and see them.'

"We went out all three—the colonel, Antoinette and myself. The Prussian did me the honors of my park. I was choking with rage. Ten times I was on the point of bursting out, but Antoinette had put her arm in mine, and she made me such droll little supplicating grimaces, and was, besides, so pretty beneath the trees, in the noon sunlight, with her assortment of diamonds and jewels, that I restrained myself and bridled my tongue.

"We entered the greenhouse. It was balmy, gay and blooming. My camellias had been petted, pampered and much made of. They were wrapped up in cotton.

"'Well, said the colonel to me, triumphantly, 'you see that we are not vandals! Now, au revoir, I will leave you to talk over your family matters. Of course, you will dine with us.'

"He invited me to dine at my own house! I could not find a single word with which to reply to him. He took his departure; that was all I desired. I was alone with Antoinette, and she, without waiting for my questions, cried out, as soon as the colonel had gone:

"'Oh! monsieur, did you notice how he looked at me as he went away? It is horrible, monsieur: it is horrible! That Prussian is in love with me! You must not scold me, monsieur. You must pity and thank me. I devoted myself to saving your house, and that's the whole of it. When that colonel arrived, on the 16th, he flew into a horrible rage learning that the proprietors had departed. He cried out: "Ah! that's the way it is, is it? Ah! they take us for barbarians! Well, I'll see what I can do with this barracks! I will stable my horses in the salon!" Then, monsieur, as I had crouched away in a corner and as the colonel had not seen me, I shot up the stairs four steps at a time, slipped on one of madame's dresses, hastened down again and said I was monsieur's neice, Madame la Baron de Barneville, a high-sounding name, which I thought would have due effect. You must acknowledge that I have not been awkward, as for more than a month I have led the colonel by the tip of the nose, and that, too, without it costing me anything, I assure you. I am too good a Frenchwoman to allow myself to be touched with the end of a finger of such a creature! Besides there are a thousand dragoons and hussars here whom I rule like a despot. I have saved your silverware, your horses, your carriages and your camellias. As to Madame's diamonds, if I wear them all, it is not for the pleasure of looking like a jewel-case, but because they are safer upon my person than in the drawers. I know not what the Bavarians amount to, but the real Prussians do not amount to much, I can tell you! And now, Monsieur, if you wish to do me a favor, you will leave this place immediately, for, in such a little game as I am playing, men are absolutely good for nothing! During breakfast I was obliged to tread on your toes two or three times to prevent you from bursting out, and a femme de chambre ought not to tread on her master's toes under the table! I will get you a good Prussian pass, and you can take with you all madame's diamonds. I will put them in a little box and Pierre will drive you away in the break. As for me, I will remain on guard. After all, it amuses me greatly to deceive these Prussians and make them believe I am a woman of rank.'

"Antoinette spoke her little speech with so much energy and conviction that I could not help admiring her.

"'You are a brave girl, Antoinette,' I said, 'a brave girl and a girl of spirit. I want you to give me something, and then I will depart as you desire.'

"'What is it, monsieur?'

"'Permission to kiss you.'

"'As niece or as femme de chambre?'

"'As femme de chambre, Antoinette.'

"'Well, go ahead, monsieur, go ahead.'

"I gave her a rousing smack, and then said:

"'Now, get ready the little box, Antoinette, but do not put that bracelet in it. Have the kindness to keep that for yourself.'

"'With pleasure, monsieur. Wait for me here; I will be back in fifteen minutes, but do not commit any imprudence; do not quarrel with the Prussians.'

"She ran lightly away. No sooner was she out of sight than I recollected that my daughter had requested me to bring her two photographs which were upon the mantel-piece on little easels. I returned to the chateau. I mounted the stairway, and near the door stopped in great surprise. Some one was playing the piano in my daughter's chamber! I knocked very modestly. 'Come.' I went in. One of the officers of dragoons, a tall, blonde young man, with eye-glass in his eye, was playing one of Chopin's waltzes upon my daughter's piano!

"'Ah! it is you,' said he. 'Monsieur, the proprietor. Make yourself at home, make yourself at home, I beg of you!'

"'I came to look for something in this chamber.'

"'Look for whatever you want, Monsieur; look for whatever you want!'

"He resumed his interrupted waltz. I went to the mantelpiece, and on the two little easels I found, instead of my portrait, a photograph of King William, and a photograph of Monsieur de Bismarck instead of the portrait of my wife! The blood rushed to my head and choking with anger, I said to the Prussian officer:

"'Monsieur, there were two portraits here. I would like to know who authorized you to replace those portraits with the photographs of those two scoundrels!'

"'What did you say, monsieur?'

"'I said those two scoundrels!'

"And snatching the photographs, I tore them up; then, with great calmness, I threw the fragments into the fire. The officer arose. He was very pale. He approached me. The question was now who should receive the first blow, and I am quite sure I would not have been the person. At this critical instant Antoinette rushed into the chamber.

"'Well, what is the matter?' demanded she.

"'This gentleman has taken the libertyof removing from these frames two photographs which I came to look for.'

"'So you did that, did you, monsieur?' said he, addressing the Prussian. 'And pray, where are those potographs?'

"'In that drawer,' he replied,

"'Give them to me.'

"'Here they are.'

"'And the Prussian officer submissively brought the two photographs to Antoinette, who handed them to me, saying as she did so:

"'Are these the portraits you want?'

"'Yes.'

"'Come away then.'

"She led me out of the room. The Prussian had cooled down immediately on Antoinette's appearance. I was utterly amazed. Antoinette had played the whole of this little scene with the coolness and self-possession of a great actress.

"'You seem astonished!' said she to me, as we were going down the stairs.

"'I am astonished!'

"'There is, however, no reason to be. Ah! the colonel is not the only one in love with me here!'

"I returned to Trouville. A whole month passed and not a single letter came from Antoinette. I began to be very uneasy, and, despite all the difficulties of the undertaking, I was preparing to risk another journey, when one morning—it was toward the close of November—my wife suddenly opened the door of my chamber and said to me:

"'Antoinette, my love; Antoinette is here; but what a state the poor child is in!'

"I saw enter a pale, thin and ragged girl, who seemed to have been devoured by fever, to have been worn out by fatigue and sickness.

"'It is I, monsieur,' said Antoinette, 'and I bring you bad news. You remember all the colonel's jokes about the Bavarians do you not? Well, to be just, that Prussian was not a bad man, and he was not wrong in regard to the Bavarians. There were movements of troops. They took our Prussians from us, they sent a detachment of Bavarian infantry, which had suffered greatly in the vicinity of the Loire and which came to us for a little recuperation. Pillage commenced at once. It must be admitted that it was very well organized, for that matter. There was a strong column of camp followers in the train of this Bavarian regiment; they threw themselves upon the chateau like a flock of crows, and began to make a kind of inventory. I went resolutely to find the major—it was a major who commanded this detachment—a fat little red-faced man, who spoke a frightful jargon, half French, half German. He commenced to utter something like cries of joy as soon as he put eyes on me, and without giving me time to speak a word, cried out: "Ah! ah! here is that paronne who is a servant, that servant who is a paronne! The Brussians are not pad, but the Pavarians are the devil! You can't catch the Pavarians as you caught the Brussians. I have spies, I have good spies! An refoir, servant, au refoir!" He said I know not what in German to an officer; two soldiers roughly seized me, and I was taken, on foot, monsieur, on foot, to Rheims, being passed by Prussian gendarmes to other Prussian gendarmes. At Rheims I was thrown into prison. I remained there for a week, upon the straw, subsisting on bread and water. At the end of the week I was taken before an officer of the Saxon cavalry, a tall, blonde young man, who had not a too wicked air. "I am about to set you at liberty," said he, "but do not attempt to return home. There is at the chateau a stupid report made by a Bavarian major. Those Bavarians are brutes! All this would not have happened to you if you had to deal with Saxons!" I was free, and I have succeeded in dragging myself here. But monsieur, your poor chateau is in bad hands. I fear you will not find much there when you return.'

"I found nothing at all there when I returned, on the 10th of February, during the armistice! No; I am wrong in saying I found nothing at all. In my greenhouse—in my poor greenhouse—on the spot formerly occupied by my delicious little marble figure from Naples and my adored camelias, were five Bavarian tombs, ornamented with poetic inscriptions like the following:

"'Here reposes Hartmann, the young and heroic Bavarian chasseur, cut down in the bloom of youth!'"

MAMMA'S VALENTINE.

I.

Baby came toddling up to my knee,
His chubby features all aglow—
"Dess I'se doin' to be oor beau—
See what oo dot f'om me!"
A va'entine from my baby boy!
A crumpled sheet and a homely scrawl
In a baby hand—that was all,
Yet it filled my heart with joy.

II.

Broken my heart and white my hair,
And my mother eyes are used to weep—
My little boy is fast asleep
In the churchyard over there.
What shall be mamma's valentine?
The spirit touch of a baby hand—
A baby voice from the spirit land,
Singing a song divine.

FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

One Rainy Day.

One day, it just rained and rained and rained at our house, and we had to stay in.

And every time we went to play anything, Aunt Nelia said, "Oh, stop that noise, children!"

And if you took anything, she said, "Let that be! let that be!" And it was awful in the house.

I got a big shawl and spread it over three chairs, and I got my dollies and my dishes and played under the shawl; and I asked Danny would he play "keep house" just to-day, because it was raining and he couldn't play out doors, anyway.

I told him I'd lend him my "Dotty" and my "Sissy" and my very best dolly, "Helena,"—if he'd be real good to her. And I'd keep Rose and Violet and Matilda myself, and then we would have three children apiece.

Rose and Violet are twins. They are made out of two dumb-bells, with a long towel pinned around each of them. They look just exactly alike, and they've got round, bald heads, just like real babies.

But Danny wouldn't play keep house. He said he'd never be a tom-girl and play with dolls, no matter if it rained forever and ever and ever.

And then he put his hands in his pockets and looked the way he always does when he won't do it. And then you know there isn't any use in teasing him.

But after a while it didn't rain so hard, and Aunt Nelia said we might go and play in the barn. But we must stay in the barn and not go out into the yard, even if it didn't rain one single drop.

We like to play in the barn.

There isn't anything in it but a big pile of hay, and in one corner there's lots of ears of corn.

We play Danny is a dentist. And the ears of corn are ladies come to have their teeth pulled.

I walk them along over the floor to Danny, and he screws the monkey-wrench down tight on one of the kernels—that's a tooth—and then he gives a pull and out it comes! And then I have to holler like everything for the lady, because it hurts her so.

Danny talks to the lady. He says, "Madam, I won't hurt you in the least." He heard a dentist say that once to a lady.

Danny had a tooth pulled that same time that the lady did, and he never hollered a bit when his tooth was pulled, and it hurt him awful—and bled and bled.

But the lady hollered.

Danny thinks she was a coward.

But I don't: I think it did hurt her. And Aunt Nelia said to Danny, "Wait till you have a double tooth out, and see if you don't holler, too!"

We pulled over so many teeth that day in the barn. But after a while we got tired of playing that, and we wished we had the new little white pigs in the barn with us to play with. They were only three days old, and they were just as cunning and little as they could be.

Danny said he'd run across to the shed and get us one apiece to play with.

But it was awful muddy in the cow yard, and I was afraid Aunt Nelia would scold if Danny got his shoes muddy.

But Danny said he would get Uncle Eben's big rubber boots off from the back porch and put on, and then he wouldn't get muddy a bit.

And so he went and got them. And he looked so funny with them on! They came clear up to his jacket on him.

And then he went to get the little pigs.

But afterwards Danny and me wished he hadn't gone for them at all.

He could not walk very well with the big boots on, and when he got most to the shed he couldn't walk at all. He just couldn't take another step, and his boots sank way down. And it began to rain, and there was Danny sticking in the mud!

Pretty soon he stepped out of the ruber boots, and he began to pull at one of the boots, to get it out, and the boot flew up, and Danny fell right over backwards into the mud.

He got up, and oh, he was just as muddy!

And then we had to go into the house, for I couldn't scrape the mud off—and Danny was so wet.

And Aunt Nelia scolded like everything, and put Danny to bed—all alone upstairs, and she made me stay down stairs. But she didn't know a thing about Uncle Eben's boots yet. And I was afraid to tell. I could see one of them standing in the mud there yet—out of the kitchen window. I kept looking to see if it was there—and it always was.

After awhile Uncle Eben wanted his boots, and he said, "Where are my rubber boots?"

Then I had to show him where one of the boots was, and I told him how it got there, and he wasn't mad a bit. He laughed. But Aunt Nelia said:

"Well, I declare! If I hadn't sent that boy to bed already, I certainly should now!"

And when Uncle Eben went out and got his boot, it was full of water, clear to the top.

THE TIRED MOTHER.

A little elbow leans upon your knee;
Your tired knee that has so much to bear,
A child's dear eyes are looking lovingly
From underneath a thatch of golden hair;
Perhaps you do not heed the velvet touch
Of warm, moist fingers folding yours so tight,
You do not prize this blessing overmuch,
You almost are too tired to pray to-night.

But it is blessedness! A year ago
I did not see it as I do to-day,
We are so dull and thankless, and too slow
To catch the sunshine till it slips away.
And now it seems surprising strange to me
That while I wore the badge of motherhood
I did not kiss more oft and tenderly
The little child that brought me only good.

And if some night, when you sit down to rest,
You miss the elbow from your tired knee,
The restless, curly head from off your breast,
The lisping tongue that chattered constantly;
If from your own the dimpled hands had slipped
And ne'er would nestle in your palm again,
If the white feet into the grave had tripped,
I could not blame you for your heartache then.

I wonder so that mothers ever fret
At little children clinging to their gown;
Or that the footprints when the days are wet,
Are ever black enough to make them frown.
If I could find a little muddy boot,
Or cap, or jacket on my chamber floor;
If I could kiss a rosy, restless foot,
And hear it patter in my house once more.

If I could mend a broken cart to-day,
To-morrow make a kite to reach the sky,
There is no woman in God's world could say
She was more blissfully content than I.
But oh! the dainty pillow next my own
Is never rumpled by a shining head;
My singing birdling from his nest is flown,
My little boy I used to kiss is dead.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

House Cleaning.

Farmer's Wife—New England Farmer: As the time is approaching for the general spring cleaning, a few suggestions may be acceptable, especially to those who have not had the benefit of long experience. There is no hurry about beginning. It is far better to wait till the last of April or the first of May, when the weather is warmer and the chilling winds have disappeared. More women are made sick by house cleaning than by any other work that they are obliged to do. The expose themselves to cold, and stand in a draught of air when heated by violent exercise, and then comes on pneumonia, lame sides, and various other complaints—the result of house cleaning. Now, if one must need begin operations before it is warm weather, just commence with the bureau drawers; arrange them at leisure, after dusting and wiping them dry; then sprinkle a few drops of spirits of turpentine on the bottom of each drawer to keep moths and flies out; then spread a clean newspaper over the bottom, and it is ready for use. Then cupboards and closets can be clean and rearranged for the summer, and it is a great assistance to have them set to rights in advance. A free sprinkling of spirits of turpentine on the floors and shelves, will keep all insects from annoying or injuring the contents, and it is most desirable to prevent them from taking refuge in the house.

It is much better to clean one apartment at a time, rather than to have the whole house stirred up in confusion all at once. Then in case of casualties, or unexpected company, there is a chance to be comfortable. There is nothing more disagreeable than to have a house all in commotion, carpets up, and curtains down, and everything in disorder, and there is no need of it. Housekeepers can manage differently if they choose. It is bad enough to have one room disarranged at a time, but that is far preferable to having it stirred up from garret to cellar, and things brought into contact that were never neighbors before.

After years of experimenting with various prescriptions to keep bedsteads free from bugs, I have found nothing more effectual than spirits of turpentine. It neither injures the bedstead or ticking, and it is perfectly safe. In a new house there is no need of allowing all these disagreeable guests to get a foothold, but if you live in an old house, there are plenty of cracks and crevices that have harbored them for years, and it is only by a long and persistent warfare against them that they can be conquered. Fresh paint on the floors and casings of an infested chamber is a good application, and keeps them in abeyance for a good while. I think if old Job had to contend with bedbugs and cockroaches, he would have found his patience sorely tried, to say the least. But perseverance will conquer all difficulties, and spirits of turpentine will give a victory if faithfully administered.

When the mud is well dried up, and the warm, May air and bright sun warms the atmosphere, you can finish your house cleaning with ease. Get your whitewashing all done up, stoves cleaned, but not set away—never do that. There are plenty of damp, cold days all through the summer months, when fires are indispensable for comfort and health, and it is very unpleasant to have the whole family huddled around the kitchen cook-stove in order to get warm. It is a most preposterous fashion, this custom of taking down the stoves as soon as warm weather comes on, and common sense would dictate the folly of such a thing if one would only stop to think how many rainy, damp days come during all the summer months. A little fire would change the atmosphere of a room, and prevent mildew gathering on the walls, and be conducive of health and comfort generally. In house cleaning, never lay out more than you can accomplish with ease before dinner—it is as long as a person ever ought to devote to such hard work, and judiciously following this rule you can get through with as much work as if you scrubbed one whole day and was sick the two following days to pay for it. Another thing, a woman should never do the whitewashing, or nail down carpets, or repaper the walls—it is not their work, and it is far cheaper for a man to either hire it done, or do it himself, than it is to pay doctors' bills, not to take in account the suffering and pain that is almost sure to follow such labor for a woman.

Sick Children.

The vicissitudes necessarily incident to an out-door and primitive mode of life are never the first causes of any disease, though they may sometimes betray its presence. Bronchitis, nowadays perhaps the most frequent of all infantile diseases, makes no exception to this rule; a draft of cold air may reveal the latent progress of this disorder, but its cause is long confinement in a vitiated and overheated atmosphere, and its proper remedy, ventilation and a mild, phlegm-loosening (saccharine) diet, warm sweet milk, sweet oatmeal porridge or honey-water. Select an airy bed room, and do not be afraid to open the windows. Among the children of the Indian tribes who brave in open tents the terrible winters of the Hudson's bay territory bronchitis, croup and diphtheria are wholly unknown; and what we call "taking cold" might often be more correctly described as taking hot; glowing stoves in a night nursery aggravate the effects of an impure atmosphere. The paroxysm of croup can be promptly relieved by the very simple remedies—fresh air, and a rapid forward and backward movement of the arms, combined in urgent cases with the application of a fresh brush (or piece of flannel) to the neck and upper part of the chest. Paregoric and poppy syrup stop the cough by lengthargizing the irritability and thus preventing the discharge of the phlegm till its accumulation produces a second and far more dangerous paroxysm. These second attacks of croup, after the administration of palliatives, are generally the fatal ones. When a child is convalescing, let him beware of stimulating food and over-heated rooms. Do not give aperient medicines; costiveness, as an aftereffect of pleuritic affection, will soon yield to fresh air and vegetable diet.

Household Hints.

A waste-paper basket in the library is a necessity, and may be a pleasant object to contemplate as well. Choose a well-made basket, and one that stands squarely on the bottom. One way to ornament the basket is to trim it with three bands of ribbon, of different colors: on the upper band embroider a vine of something green with oxeyed daisies to brighten it; where the ends join cover them with a large and handsome bow. If inclined to take so much trouble, line the basket, and finish the upper edge with a puff of satin or of heavy silk. A handsome basket may be lined with cashmere with a ruching around the top, and hanging over the edge a sort of lambrequin made of strips of red and white cashmere, rounded at the bottom and pinked on the edge, and completed by having a bouquet of flowers in applique or in Kensington embroidery. A tassel on the bottom of each piece is a good addition; the pieces keep their shape better with a tassel. Another pretty way is to put a band of canvas, either drab, blue or scarlet, around the basket; below this put a band of black velvet; brighten both by embroidery; one design to work on the velvet is a procession of Kate Greenaway children. A handsome ribbon bow adds to the good effect.

That is not a bad custom which provides that fish shall appear on the dinner-table at least once a week, and there are so many ways in which even the sometimes despised codfish may be cooked that we need not be tired of it. Catfish also may be made a very inviting dish. Here is one way: Cut it in pieces about two inches in length and one inch in thickness; beat three eggs very light, adding salt, pepper, and enough Worcestershire sauce to flavor them; dip the fish in this batter, and then roll it in cornmeal or in cracker crumbs; fry in plenty of lard until it is a dark brown; garnish with lemon sliced, if no greens are available; celery tops, parsley, or small and tender lettuce leaves are preferred.

Boiled tongue, if browned in the oven, and served with a dressing made of bread crumbs, butter and sage, makes a good foundation for a plain dinner. Baste the tongue while in the oven liberally with butter and water, and let this help to make a brown gravy to be poured over the tongue. Before putting the tongue in the oven its appearance may be improved by cutting off the ends, so that it shall be more in shape like a roast of beef or mutton. These pieces thus cut off can be sliced and browned in butter and be sent to the breakfast table with baked potatoes, corn muffins, and coffee.

A good fish sauce is made of half a cup of vinegar, half a cup of water, the yolks of one or two eggs, a tablespoonful of butter, a third of a teaspoonful of ground mustard, and half a teaspoonful of corn starch, a little sugar, pepper, and salt. Stir the lumps from the mustard and corn starch when mixed with the vinegar, beat it gradually, and let it boil for about one minute. This may be used cold, on canned salmon or lobster; it will need a little more vinegar in that case to thin it. It may also be used in making a salad with lettuce. If possible, substitute fresh white mustard leaves for the ground mustard.

A sweet potato pudding, made after the following rule, is recommended to the lover of variety: To two cups of mashed sweet potato (the potato must first be boiled) add a cup of sugar, a small cup of butter, three eggs, a fourth of a teaspoonful of soda, dissolved in a little hot water, a teaspoonful of lemon extract, and half a teaspoonful of grated nutmeg. Beat the eggs until they are very light, rub the butter and sugar to a cream, and mix all with the potato; cover a deep plate or shallow pudding dish with a rich and thick crust; then put in the mixture, and bake slowly for three-quarters of an hour.

It may not be known to all that the boiled frosting will go much further in covering a cake than that which is not cooked, and consequently is much less expensive. A little practice in making it will insure success every time. The only fear of failure comes from the danger of cooking the sugar too long. Let it boil until it "hairs" or "threads" from the spoon; then take it off from the stove and stir briskly, in the well-broken whites of eggs. The quantity must be determined by your needs.

A delicious cream cake to be eaten while fresh is made of half a pound of flour, three ounces of butter, one teaspoonful of baking powder, two heaping tablespoonfuls of sugar or a small teacupful, a pinch of salt, a teaspoonful of grated lemon peel, a cupful of cream that is not entirely sweet, and one egg. Beat the butter to a cream, and mix the flour with it, then add the other ingredients; mix thoroughly, and bake in a moderate oven. This is especially nice with fresh fruit.

Novel and strikingly elegant piano and table scarfs are made of plush, with figures applied in odd and out-of-the-way designs. These figures may be purchased at art stores, they are cut from Turkish scarfs or shawls, and are to be pasted to the plush, and then, after being outlined with gilt thread, are to be used as a sort of center for long stitches in all colored embroidery silks. Much ingenuity and expression of individual taste may be exercised in the embroidery.

Here is a pudding recipe especially intended for Dorcas, and for those who, like her, are trying to economize in the expenditure for the table: One quart of flour, one-half pound of suet chopped very fine; add a good pinch of salt; wet with water; roll out and spread a layer of any kind of fruit you please over it; roll it up, and put it in a cloth, leaving room for the pudding to swell. Steam for an hour and a half.

Here are directions for making excellent rolls for tea: One quart of flour, one-half teaspoonful of salt, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one tablespoonful of lard, one pint of milk; mix in as soft a dough as you can handle easily, and take pains not to work in much flour on the kneading-board; cut out in narrow strips about five inches long; rub the top over with a little sweet milk and bake in a hot oven.

Serviceable housekeepers' aprons are made by taking two breadths of fine white cotton cloth. Cut one breadth in two parts, and put one of these on at each side, so that there will not be a seam in front of the apron; make with a deep hem and a broad insertion of rick-rack, or of Hamburg, or of darned net. Tie with long, broad strings.

Do not line your pretty willow basket. If you wish to brighten it with a suggestion of color, run a ribbon through the row of holes near the top, and tie in a bow at its sides. Cut a piece of pasteboard the exact size of the bottom of the basket, cover this with silesia, cashmere or silk and tack with a few stitches to the bottom of the basket.

Serviceable tidies are made of butchers' linen, hemmed at the sides and fringed at the ends; work in outline some quaint figure; work with marking cotton warranted not to fade, or with etching silk.

THE WORLD IS GROWING BETTER.

The world is growing better!
Thought takes a wider sweep;
The hand of sturdy labor
With a friendly hand we greet;
We will not drink the bitter
When so little makes it sweet.

The world is growing richer,
No wealth brought from the earth—
But better far, with treasures found
In mines of sterling worth,
For noble deeds are honored more
Than simple claims of birth.

The world is growing better!
With fewer musty creeds,
With more of human strivings
To answer human needs,
With precious harvests garnered
As the growth of precious seeds.

FOR RELIGIOUS REFLECTION.

How to Preach.

Congregationalist: There is now in progress at Cambridge, before the divinity school, a series of very valuable lectures given by professors of the university who are not connected with the divinity school. President Eliot gave the first lecture of the course. Dr. A. P. Peabody, Mr. Winsor, the librarian, Prof. Trowbridge and Prof. Hill (Boylston professor of rhetoric), have occupied the other evenings of the course. Prof. Hill's subject on the evening of the 14th was English in the Pulpit. His lecture was as good as a tonic. If any minister is afflicted with a "holy tone," or speaks the old-fashioned dialect of the pulpit, or cultivates a weakly and sentimental piety, or practices asceticism, he ought to get hold of the ideas presented by Prof. Hill and embody them forthwith in his mental and moral constitution. The lecture was a plea for naturalness, directness, vigor, manliness, and common sense in preaching, as opposed to the ecclesiasticism, the pulpit conventionalities, the "goody-goody" phrases, the cant, the sentimentality, which some preachers exhibit on the one hand, and the sensationalisms and slang which are heard from the pulpits of a few on the other hand. Good English in the pulpit must conform to the same standards as good English out of the pulpit. The usage and authority of the best writers and speakers must be followed everywhere. The minister must interest while he speaks, and must impress after he has ceased to speak. His language must be that with which men are familiar in other walks of life; in the best books they read and the best speakers they hear. A minister who violates the rules of syntax requires the same treatment as any other man sinning in the same way. There are certain temptations in the ministerial office to the development of unmanly traits. The notion that a clergyman is a willing recipient of favors of all sorts, the fact it is nobody's interest to criticise a preacher—except his wife's—help on this tendency, against which one must guard. Vigor in the pulpit will be respected by vigor outside of it; so, also, clearness, conciseness, sincerity. A preacher must keep the springs of his own life full, in order to refresh others. He must read not merely the literature of his profession. He must be more than a bookworm. He must mingle among men, he must know things, he must be familiar with nature. There are sermons that have no connection with the preacher; they are manufactured with the assistance of commentaries and other men's thoughts. But real sermons are a growth, they are the fruit of character and culture. They are the result of a mind working with all its energies toward a definite purpose.

A Mexican Mission.

The Church of Jesus, a missionary enterprise started in Mexico a few years ago, by the Protestant Episcopal church, does not appear to be in a very flourishing condition. Bishop Riley was put at its head; and though no allegations are as yet made against his personal integrity and ability, it is loudly asserted by many that he is tyrannical and that the movement has been a fiasco from the beginning. The Rev. J. Milton Green, a missionary in Mexico, has written a letter to The Christian at Work, in which he makes serious charges of mismanagement and sectarian bigotry against some of the missionaries of the "Church of Jesus." In view of all this, it is promised that the foreign missionary committee of the Protestant Episcopal church will look into the facts, "and at the proper time will give the explanation to those who have a right to expect it." The Independent thus describes the existing condition of the Mexican Church of Jesus: "The present state of the church appears to be one of division. It is divided into so many dioceses that it is a question whether the canonical clergy will not be almost all employed in furnishing the episcopate. It is divided into rival bodies, which have dropped the work of reformation to fight each other. The schools are divided, and part of the scholars are under the care of another church. The theologial seminary has closed until further orders. As to the congregations nobody can tell anything about them until the storm blows over and the fragments are picked up. There is one consolation for the Riley party; it has still in its employ as many as its financial resources can provide for. The name of the church is still long enough for division; and, doubtless, there is left territory which can be sliced into dioceses. We recall that Bishop Riley has a genius for organization. A few years ago he organized and equipped a Reformed church or two in Spain and Portugal."

Dr. Dix's Charges Again.

Christian Union: To charge licentiousness on Protestantism, as Dr. Dix does, is to ignore the well-known statistics of morals. Unchastity is the common sin of Roman Catholic France and Italy, while chastity is the national virtue of Protestant Germany and England. On the other hand, Puritan New England appears to be rapidly degenerating in morals, while the Roman Catholic population of America appear to be chaste and to preserve inviolate the family relation. Neither church can cast a first stone at the other in this matter. The doctrine that marriage is a civil contract is a natural but gross reaction from the sacramentarian theory of the middle ages. It is indeed a divine ordinance, and equally divine whether the marriage ceremony be performed by a bishop, by a justice of the peace, or by the parties themselves. If, instead of attempting to get us all into the Holy Catholic church, Dr. Dix would inaugurate a movement—moral, religious, and non-ecclesiastical, founded on the Bible, and not on church decrees—to repeal the laws for the promotion of licentiousness, emphatically called "divorce laws," he would find ready to follow him enough men of all faiths, and forms, and creeds, to have some eventual hope of success.

A Strange Announcement.

The War Cry, the organ of the English Salvation army, recently contained the following sensational announcement in large display headlines: "Frozen to death last Sunday, owing to the extreme cold prevailing all around him (no professed worshipper of God having even given him a warm shake of the hand or a sparkling look), Jack Godless died in his sins without the least hope, and his soul perished! As he did not feel like going to any place of worship, and as nobody seemed particularly to want him to go, he stayed out in the fog, where so many millions remain unable to see whether there is anything in religion. He might have been saved if anybody had been willing to take the trouble to go out to him, but those whose duty it was to do so thought it was quite unreasonable to expect them to turn out such a day! His dead body, having been duly laid out, and the fact of his death having been generally made known, an inquest was held without the assistance of the coroner, at the headquarters of the Salvation army, 101 Queen Victoria street, E. C., where the following verdict was directed to be entered in the War Cry: 'The soul of the deceased was lost owing to exposure to temptation without any friendly help to salvation, and there can be no doubt that somebody was guilty of gross negligence!'"

Droppings from the Sanctuary.

During the week of prayer recently held in a Pennsylvania congregation, one of the brethren had some remarks to make about temperance and the habit some people had of drinking cider. "I am going to pray to the Lord," he added, "that any one of this congregation, who makes or handles or sells the stuff shall have a burden of sorrow put upon him until he turns from the error of his ways." "When do you begin, Brother Smith?" asked a toil-hardened granger, as he rose up. "To-night, Brother Tompkins—this very night." "I wish you wouldn't. I've got forty barrels of cider on hand, and I want you to give me twenty-four hours in which to sell and ship. After that you can peel your coat and go in six-horse power."

A hopeless case is that the jail bird who has just obtained his freedom. What can he do? Where can he go in quest of the means of earning a livelihood. He can present no letter of recommendation from his last place of employment. One Michael Dunn, opened a home of industry in New York, where discharged convicts are made welcome. It is at No. 40 East Houston street. There they obtain work, and the opportunity of earning their bread and a good character.

The Episcopalians propose to establish a divinity school in Colorado. It is said to be almost impossible to get pastors from the East, as the field is a hard working and underpaid one. They have a frame building to begin with, but want at least $20,000 endowment, the immediate funds to be devoted to furniture and other items. The Rev. W. C. Bishop, a fellow of Emmanuel college, Cambridge, has been engaged as dean or president.

The Presbyterian Synod of Kentucky proposes to raise $15,000 by next October to erect a dormitory and boarding hall as an addition to the buildings of the Central university, to be called the Centennial Memorial hall, and to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the establishment of Presbyterianism in the State, which will occur in October next.

A certain little three-year-old likes very much to go to church, and especially enjoys the singing. One day the choir sang "Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me," and after she got home, the little one was heard singing very seriously, "Rock the babies, kept for me."

There are fifteen Baptist sects in the mother country, and one of them calls itself the Unitarian Baptist denomination. Of couse, many of these are small and obscure, and they are not included in the statistics of the English Baptist handbook.

The Moravian mission, on the Mosquito coast, Central America, reports a wonderful religious awakening among the Indians. Over 400 persons have united with the church thus far, and others have applied for admission.

One of the best definitions of faith was given by a bright Sunday school boy to his teacher: "As near as I can make it out, it is feeling perfectly sure of a thing when you have nothing to back it up."

The colored church at Austin, Ark., on a recent Sunday, being half full of water, on account of the flood, the pastor climbed to the roof and preached a sermon to the congregation attending in skiffs.

In the Episcopal church at Dent, Yorkshire, two long shelves are filled every Sunday with loaves for the poor, which they carry away with them after the service. This is solid religion.

The census of missions to be taken next year will, it is estimated, show an increase of 200,000 native Christians in India, Ceylon and Burmah for the last ten years—500,000 in all.

The sessions of State legislatures all over the country are opened with religious exercises, and many devout people are, in consequence, beginning to doubt the efficacy of prayer.

Carp in Minnesota Lakes.

St. Paul, April 10.—To the Editor: Mr. T. Z. Rogers of Waterville, under date April 10, writes as follows:

"Two years since I received twenty or twenty-five carp from Washington and put them in a small pond on my place. I raised the water with a dam, but the first year it did not hold up well, and my man said 'not one weathered the first winter.' I looked last year many times and saw nothing of them and gave up having any left. To-day my man said there were dead fish on the lake shore. I at once sent him after them. He found three dead ones and brought them in. I do not know how long they have been dead; they were twenty-one inches long and weighed six pounds each. I am in hopes there may be a few left to spawn; if twenty, all O. K. Last spring I put another lot in a lake near by, and this season, those received in the same place. I found the water eight feet deep, and we think we will have a good thing as there is ten acres and no other fish."

I would suggest where small ponds and lakelets are stocked that it is necessary to keep an air hole open through the ice during the winter, and more particularly toward spring, as the fish begin to move about in the middle of February or beginning of March, and if they are under such thick ice that there is no air accessible they smother for want of it. I am in hopes that Mr. Rogers will find the rest of his carp not only surviving but doing well.

Bernhardt's Resemblances.

Some of Bernhardt's confessions in her forthcoming book of memoirs are as remarkable for egotism as anything she has ever done. She was not very pretty as a girl she thinks, but she "resembled a little the Mater Dolorosa of Velasquez," and she moreover had "the thin arms of the Fornarina the indolence of Titian's Venus, the dreamy look of Raphael's St. Cecilia." Her family, in fact, were quite as remarkable as she in their resemblances to beautiful or famous objects. "My uncle, on the father's side," she says, "had the grace of the Apollo of Belvedere. My uncle on my mother's side resembled Antinous, and my cousins were tall, handsome, with fine blue eyes, fair hair and white teeth. They were constantly set forth as types of elegance and good taste. They were all full of wit and spirit. I will say nothing of myself, but have the persuasion that I resemble my family."

THE HAWKEYE CAPITOL.

The Home of the Iowa State Officials Approaching Completion—The Vacant Railway Commissionership—Important Railroad Cases—The Champion Phrenologist.

Des Moines, Special Correspondence, April 19.—The new capitol is now beginning to show the ultimate design of the builders. The senate chamber is completed, except the wood work on the main floor and placing the furniture. The painting, frescoing and stucco work on the walls and ceiling are done. The stucco work in the hall of the house is also done, and the frescoing is begun. On the panels in the ceiling will be painted portraits of Washington, Lincoln, Robert Lucas, the first Territorial governor; James W. Grimes, ex-governor of the State; Charles Mason, chief justice of the Territorial supreme court; J. P. Carlton, speaker of the Sixth Territorial legislature; Rush Clark, speaker of the Ninth general assembly; Gen. M. M. Crocker, and Gen. Samuel R. Curtis. The fresco work is done by Signor E. S. Miragholi, a fine artist. His talent for imitating solid substances is remarkable, and it is difficult to believe that it is deception. His designs and coloring are admirably executed. To give in detail the ornamentation would require too much space. A single instance will illustrate the perfection of his work. One day, Mr. Griffith, superintendent of the stucco work, discovered in one of the arches a rosette, which he had no recollection of having placed there, and supposed some of his men had put it there, but they knew nothing about it. A man was sent to remove it, and clambering up to it, pronounced it not stucco, but paint. Mr. Griffith would not believe it until he had himself passed his hand over it and found it plain surface. In another arch is a bunch of wheat so perfect in imitation of the grain as to deceive a pretty intelligent granger. The furniture, carpets and curtains have been selected for both legislative halls. The house desks and chairs will be solid mahogony. The curtains of harmonizing colors; the carpets the best grade of Bigelow make, also with red color predominating. The senate furniture will be solid black walnut. The carpet will be of dark terra cotta color, and the curtains of lighter shade. The fixtures will be new special designs in hammered brass. The special effort now being made is to finish the legislative halls and offices for the secretary of state, governor and lieutenant governor, and committee rooms in time for the meeting of the next legislature. It will require at least two years to complete the edifice, and when done it will be one of which any people may be proud, and it will be one of the very few public buildings in which there has been no jobbery or steals.

RAILROAD COMMISSIONER.

The governor has not yet selected a successor to Wilson on the board of railroad commissioners. During the past week the name of D. W. Mott of Franklin county has been presented with strong endorsement by citizens of that section. He is a wealthy farmer, and a very able man, of extended general information, and considered fully competent for the place by those who know him. He never held a public office and does not seek this, the application being made solely by his friends. It is from him Mott township in that county takes its name. It is well understood that the governor would be pleased to make a selection from the northern part of the State, if the proper person can be found. It is very desirable that he should be well known, that the people may be satisfied as to the choice. It has been intimated by a Dubuque paper that the railroad companies are the power behind the throne, and are manipulating this appointment to their advantage—an accusation as unjust as it is uncalled for. The selection of Mr. Wilson certainly was not at the suggestion of railroad companies. Of all men he was to them most objectionable. Having made a selection so eminently and satisfactory to the farmers of Iowa, it is but natural he should now seek to do equally as well. There are no important matters before the board which require haste, and public interests will be best subserved, probably, by delay.

RAILROAD MATTERS.

The new law protecting the lives of persons and the property of railroad companies is being enforced, with beneficial results. Two cases have already arisen, and been brought into court by the Chicago & Rock Island. The first case was that of a young man who stole a hand car at Atlantic and ran it to Avoca, and then down the branch to Griswold. Superintendent Royce sent a locomotive and officer after him, when he was arrested and heavily fined. The second case was that of a man who shipped a lot of live stock and household goods to Harlan. Before the stuff was unloaded he wanted one car moved to another point, but the engineer and brakeman had gone to dinner, and he was told the car would be moved as soon as the train men returned. The man got mad, and concluded he would do his own switching. He mounted the engine, pulled open the throttle, and the drivers began to spin. The engineer, who was but a few rods away, heard the racket, and, supposing his machine had started for a runaway, rushed to the cab, reaching it just as the wheels had got a grip on the rails and began to move off. The pseudo engineer was inside the cab, a fully scared man, and he was promptly ejected, with vigorous language, by the engineer. He was arrested and bound over for further trial. The penalty for this act is a heavy fine and imprisonment. In the case of hand cars, if a collision occurs by which a human being is killed, the offender is deemed guilty of manslaughter. Several lives have been lost by collision with hand cars which persons have stolen to take a ride on the rail, and this law is to guard against such accidents. The case at Harlan was a narrow escape. As the branch is thirteen miles down grade to the main line at Avoca, where at that hour are usually several trains standing, a serious collision would probably have occurred. This same law also prohibits by severe penalties interferance with the automatic brake cords, and bell ropes on passenger trains, and was suggested by a growing habit of commercial travelers and smart young chaps, who would get on a train which they knew did not stop at the station they desired get off at, and on reaching the station would pull the automatic brake cord and skip out. Several instances occurred where collisions happened thereby, and several narrow escapes from trains following which had the right to expect the way ahead was clear. Since this law was passed, the brake cords are all let alone, for the railroad companies are determined to enforce it to the full extent.

It is reported the Central Iowa, in accordance with the recommendation of the board of railroad commissioners, will run their trains and operate the road to Northwood.

THE IOWA PIONEER APPLE GROWER.

James Smith, the veteran pomologist, who started the first apple orchard in Iowa, and after thirty-five years' toil, by which he had surrounded himself with fine buildings and all the surroundings of a pleasant home witnessed the growth of this city from a hamlet of half a dozen houses in sight of his own door, at the age of seventy-three, has gone to Dakota to do it all over again and grow up with the country. He is a remarkable man. He is probably one of the best authorities on the apple in this country, and is so recognized in all prominent pomological societies. It was he who selected the fruit, from trees of his own propagating, which took the first prize at the United States fair in Chicago thirty years ago; again at Philadelphia and at Richmond a few years ago, and the fruit was all grown in this county. Show him the leaf from an apple tree and he will tell you the variety of the apple borne on the tree. He has gone to Faulk county, and it is sufficient to say that he took with him but two varieties of trees to plant in that section—the Duchess of Oldenburg and the Wealthy. He will try Giddon's Seedling; and here let me say Mr. Giddon will find him a valuable aid in fruit growing in Minnesota. And right here let me warn Minnesota and Northern Iowa farmers against the Belle de Boskoop, a Russian, which will probably be vigorously forced as an iron-clad, "hardy as the Duchess." It was tested several years by Prof. Budd at the agricultural college, and also in Floyd county, and failed, but is highly recommended for the southern portion of the State; and Mr. Dixon's, of Nebraska, has fruit of it which is just now in perfection, and it is rich and toothsome. As he has not reported this as among the saved of his trees, it has probably succumbed to the elements.

BOUND FOR SPIRIT LAKE.

President Whitehead, of the Des Moines & Fort Dodge road, is now making an effort to secure trackage over the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul from Ruthven to Spirit Lake, which will virtually extend the Fort Dodge to that point. If he does not succeed, he will at once begin the extension of his road north.

Congressman Holmes will hold a competitive examination at Webster City, May 30, for the appointment of a naval cadet to represent his district.

CROOKSTON, - - MINNESOTA.

The real estate boom in St. Paul and Minneapolis beats all other previous activities in that line, as well it may, for the basis is far better than ever before known in the history of those cities.

The United States census of 1880 shows that there were 440,262 people o Scandinavian birth in this country in June of that year, of whom 181,729 were from Norway, 194,397 from Sweden, and 64,196 from Denmark. Generally, the Scandinavians make excellent American citizens, conforming to the habits, customs and institutions of the country more readily than most other nationalities. It is probable that the number of Scandinavians in this country has increased since 1880 to at least 500,000, and "still they come"—a hardy, industrious and thrifty race.

Much to the surprise of the people who a year ago doubted whether an exhibition of railway appliances could be made very successful, the National Rail way Exposition to be held in the hear of Chicago from May 24 to June 23 is exciting the keenest interest, and although the Interstate Exposition buildings are the largest of their kind in the country t has been necessary to erect an annex to provide space for all the exhibits The collection of the most primitive railway appliances is a special feature of the enterprise, and it will be both instructive and amusing to compare the railway facilities of the past with those of the present. The first locomotive ever built, George Stephenson's "Rocket," will, of course, be the center of attraction during the exposition.

Whatever may be thought of Mormorism or of any of its adherents, will not invalidate the fact that it has assumed considerable proportions and is growing with remarkable rapidity. It is vital in propogandism and defiant in strength. Its missionaries find abundant recruits in Europe and proselytes are numerous in the United States. The leaders are frequently men of education and remarkable skill in affairs, and the devotion of the members of the church resists all the influence of knewledge, the enlightment of the age, and the force of public opinion. The history of the Mormon church is perhaps, all things considered, the most remarkable event of the age and is a perpetual puzzle to all reasonable understanding. What the outcome will be no one can tell, but one thing is certain, it can never be crushed by anything that savors of persecution. That thing has been tried.

The revolution in Hayti, of which only brief particulars have come to hand, is an uprising of the mulattoes, who comprise about one-third of the population, and its most intelligent and progressive class, against the intolerable tyrannies of President Solomon, representing the black domination. Their property has been confiscated, and hundreds have been shot without trial, while others have been imprisoned or banished. It is said that they have formed an alliance with black leaders, rivals of Solomon, who have some popular following of their own race, and are aided by the revolt against the general tyranny and burdensome taxation of his administration. Whether they will succeed or not is a matter about which no reasonable conjecture can be formed, from the lack of definite information, but success is generally deemed improbable. Hayti is a black nation of the purest type, full of barbarism and ferocity. It is an ungrateful fact for thos who hope for the native improvemen of the negro race.

Cooper Institute, New York, is a fine and enduring monument to the memory of the late Peter Cooper. Thousands now living and yet to come will always bear in grateful remembrance the name of the benefactor who helped them to educate themselves and lay the foundation of their success and happiness. Early in life Mr. Cooper felt the difficulties that young people meet in seeking education in art and science. He determined to aid those who should come after him by placing within the reach of any one in his native city the means of getting such education as each person might most need. The building for the Cooper union was begun in 1855, on its present site at the junction of Third and Fourth avenues and Eighth street. The first cost amounting to more than $600,000—and all the expenses of the Union, have been defrayed by Mr. Cooper. The plan of the Union is based largely upon the working of the Polytechnic school of Paris. There are free schools for instruction in the æsthetic and industrial arts and in scientific departments beyond the teaching given in the public schools. There are regular courses of lectures on subjects of art, science, political and social economy, and literature, and more than twenty professors and instructors are employed at an annual expense of $50,000. This great expense is met by the endowment bestowed by Mr. Cooper and by the rental of business stores in the building, which is, of course, equally his gift,

Southern Lumber Resources,

It is computed that the forests of Texas will supply the whole country with timber for 100 years.

North Carolina has an acreage of growing timber amounting to about 75 per cent. of her territory.

The yellow pine forests of Florida extend over three-fifths of the six counties of Putman, Marion, Sumter, Polk, Hernando and Hillsborough.

Louisiana's timber lands cover 15,000,000 acres. It is said that the lumber business of Maine and Michigan will ultimately be transferred to Florida and Louisiana.

A great pine belt stretches across Southern Georgia and Alabama to the rivers that flow into Mobile Bay. The pine forests of Georgia alone cover an area of about 11,500,600 acres.

There are immense tracts of cottonwoods along the Mississippi and its tributaries. The cottonwood tree reaches the height of seventy feet, and planks from four to six feet wide are easily cut from it. It is perfectly free from knots and pitch,

Gossip from Washington.

Pension Commissioner Dudley has issued a circular requesting special examiners to give public notice that they are authorized to collect money for fees or expenses from pensioners or applicants for pensioner; also that all special examiners are provided with certificates signed by the commissioners of pensions and secretary of the interior, and bearing the seal of the interior department. Without such certificates, all persons claiming to be pensions examiners are frauds. This circular has been brought out by complaints reaching the pension office of swindles perpetrated by persons having no authority to act for the pension office. The commissioners asks that some responsible person report to his office all suspected cases of the above nature, with a description of the alleged examiner.

The treasury department has prepared for the change in the revenue laws, affecting stamps to be placed upon articles from which internal revenue will be collected after May 1, by shipping to collectors throughout the United States stamps of new denominations to the value of $30,000,000. The shipment was made Monday, so that stamps may be in the hands of collectors for sale by May 1. The stamps shipped are of all denominations made up in 1,150 packages, weighing in the aggregate fifteen tons and requiring 200 of the largest size mail pouches to accommodate them.

Mr. Stevens, acting commissioner of Indian affairs, said Monday that he had received a letter from Dr. Ashley Thompson, at Lake Winnebagoshish, to the effect that the Indians stricken with small pox at that agency were all convalescent and improving rapidly. They are still in quarantine. The clothing and cloth ordered by the department for the patients had been received and put into use. He says the patients will be in such condition by May 15 that he will be able to leave there at that time, when he will be permanently transferred to Rosebud agency.

Summary of General News.

A conflict between the real and the ideal has arisen in the midst of those charming songsters the Boston Ideals. Mr. Foster, the advance agent, engaged Miss. Beebe, as she says, with the expectation that he could call on her in her room. Mr. Wheeler, the business manager, however, was the recepient of this privilege. Disappointment embittered Foster's good intentions, and Miss Beebe and Mr. Wheeler were both discharged and Foster made business manager. As Miss Beebe has a husband lingering in the back ground, a divorce suit is relied on to give the Ideals some free and unsavory advertising.

When T. B. Keogh succeeded Robert M. Douglass as United States marshal for the Western district of North Carolina, Douglass refused to turn over to his successor certain official records, alleging that they were necessary to the settlement of his accounts with the department of justice. Thereupon, the attorney general directed the United States attorney for that district to make an effort to have Douglass indicted on a charge of abstracting government property. The presiding judge of the circuit is father-in-law of Douglass. An attempt is being made to bring about a settlement of the difficulty.

The long contested suit of O'Neil vs. the Chicago and Northwestern railway has been tried before a jury in the United States supreme court three times. The last trial was concluded Friday by a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $15,000, the full amount prayed for. O'Neil is a young man who lost a leg while in the employ of the Northwestern company at Dubuque. He was run over by a switch engine through the carelessness of the engineer.

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury French, in speaking of the tariff bill, said it was evident that the government would be involved in a large number of suits on account of the doubled meaning of some of the provisions of the bill. Within a few days questions have been brought to the attention of the department which will most certainly result in numerous law suits unless the decisions are altogether in favor of the importers, which is not at all probable.

Mayor Edson of New York made an argument recently before the committee on cities of the legislature at Albany in favor of his bill clothing the mayor with power to appoint chiefs of departments and commissioners, and depriving the board of aldermen of the right to confirm nominations of the mayor. He said the present system was demoralizing and dangerous to public interests.

Crimes and Criminals.

A party by the name of Welsh, who lives thirty miles west of Mitchell, Dak., and who has held a pre-emption over thirty-three months, the time the law allows each pre-emptor, shot a man for filing a contest on the same. The settler was plowing when the contestant came upon the land to post the contest notice. He advised him not to post it or he would shoot him. The contestant paid no heed to the warning, but went ahead and stuck up the notice, whereupon Welsh pulled a revolver and shot him dead.

James Williams, of the firm of Williams & McCauley, lumber dealers, of Big Creek, Tenn., has been arrested for embezzling $20,000 from a New York firm in 1876. Williams escaped to Mexico, but returned to this country. He failed last week for $50,000, owing $35,000 in this city. It seems the true name of Williams is Lathrop. He was cashier of his father's banking house in New York city. The robbery was committed in August last.

William T. Church, Jr., the outgoing comptroller of the village of Hyde Park, Ill., arranged to meet the treasurer, for the purpose of having his accounts verified, preparatory to turning the office over to his successor. He failed to keep his appointment, and the authorities have broke open the safe in his office. Examination of his accounts showed a shortage of $7,700. A warrant has been issued for his arrest. He has always borne a good reputation.

Smuggling is being extensively practiced on the Rio Grande river, and the distric attorney for the southern district of Texas, and the collector of customs at Brownville, disagree as to the authority of the latter to arrest smugglers. The solicitor of the treasury says that officers have the same legal right to arrest offenders that they have to seize smuggled goods, provided arrests are not made on Mexican territory.

At Munfordsville, Ky., Booth Edwards (colored), sentenced to be hanged May 18, for the murder of Arch Long last December, attempted to break jail recently. Calling the jailor to bring him a tub of water for a bath, he rushed out on that officer with pistol in hand, and would have escaped had not the jailer's wife locked the outer doors. Finding escape cut off Edwards returned to his cell, shot himself through the head killing himself instantly.

Burglars have been plying their vocation at Chaska. A ew nights ago they broke into the furniture store of Burkhart Bros. and blew open the safe, securing about $100 cash. On the same night they pried open the front door of Linenfelser & Faber's store, but as there was a large watch dog inside it is supposed they became alarmed and ran off.

Dr. George H. Marshall, charged with an attempt to blackmail Mary Anderson, had a preliminary hearing before United States Commissioner McCandless in Pittsburg a few days ago, and was held for trial in the United States court May 7. He was afterwards released on $1,000 bail.

The Casualty and Fire Record.

Charles Walters (colored) died in great agony at Amsterdam, N. Y., from the effects of the explosion of a dynamite cartridge in his hand. According to common belief, he was the murderer of William Percival, who was killed and his body placed on the railroad track in 1879. Walters was tried for the murder, but escaped through legal technicalities. He maintained his innocence to the last.

A fire at Huntington, W. Va. recently destroyed $40,000 worth of property, rendering homeless fifteen or twenty familes and leaving but four buildings in a block 420 feet square. The insurance is about one-half. A man named Ray was seriously injured by the fall of a building.

A pile-driving car, while at work on a bridge crossing a creek eighteen miles from Helena, Ark., on the Iron Mountain railway, recently, fell through the bridge carrying with it fourteen men. Four men were badly injured, one of them, the engineer, Fitzgerald, it is feared, fatally.

Personal Mention.

Rev. David R. Breed, of the house of Hope, St. Paul, was found Thursday by the janitor lying in the aisle of one of the transepts, suffering from severe injuries, which he had sustained in a fall from a ladder. He had been adjusting electrical apparatus for lighting to a reflector in the roof, and it is believed he fell the whole distance from the top of the ladder—about twenty-four feet. Mr. Breed was unconscious, and it was supposed that his injuries were of a very serious nature, as his limbs and sides were badly contused. In the evening Drs. Hand, Lee and Metcalf made an examination of his injuries and found as the result, however, that no bones had been broken. They were also of the opinion that he had received no internal injuries.

Lieut. Robert T. Ames, Eight infantry, has been ordered to accompany a detachment of recruits to San Francisco. Second Lieut. John H. Beacon, at his own request, has been transferred from the Eighteenth to the Third infantry, and will join his company at Fort Howe, Montana. The superintendent of the general recruiting service has been directed to forward 175 recruits to Fort Snelling for assignment, as follows: Seventy-five to the fifth infantry, fifty to the Eighteenth and one-hundred for assignment, fifty to the Fifteenth infantry, and fifty to the Twelfth infantry.

The fumes are still rising from the Sprague divorcement. The governor explains how he lied to the Virginia parson who spliced him and his picked-up wife by saying that he never withdrew the uncomfortable charges he made against Kate Chase, and they were not expunged from the record. The records impeach this statement.

Speaking of the late Leonard B. Hodges the Rochester, N. Y. Democrat and Chronicle says: Western New York may well be proud of the great service of one of her sons in the northwest. His work is one that will endure to bless the people of that region. He was a pioneer in forest culture, where forests were greatly needed.

Foreign News Summary.

Timothy Kelly, charged with participating in the murders of Cavendish and Burke, was placed on trial on the 19th inst., and Sullivan and McInnery were appointed to conduct the defense. Judge O'Brien complied with the request of Dr. Webb and Adams to be relieved from further duty in defending the accused men. A jury was then sworn in, one of whom was a Parnellite, and consequently it is expected that the jury will fail to agree. The evidence of witnesses for the crown was mostly a repetition of that given in the cases of James Brady and Daniel Curley. James Carey swore that the conspirators had resolved to murder Col. Hiller and Burke in consequence of an article that appeared in the Freeman's Journal speaking of the desirability of a thorough change of officials at Dublin castle, which had become an Augean stable. This same statement was made by Carey at the preliminary examination of the prisoners, and was then declared by the Freeman's Journal to be due to the fact that E. Dwyer Gray, owner of that paper, when Chairman of the municipal commission, had charged Carey, who was town counselor, with conspiracy.

In the house of lords, Lord Dunraven called attention to the distress in Ireland, and urged a comprehensive scheme of emigration. The marquis of Landsdowne also favored emigration, stating that there were a quarter of a million of tenants whose holdings were unable to support them, even if they pay no rent. The steamer Scandinavian sailed from Moville for Quebec and Montreal with 282 Mayo emigrants. It is stated that 1,300 persons of Galway have applied to the government for assistance to go to America.

Brady said, the other day, it is reported, that he had in his possession facts that would afford basis for indictments, similar to that against Kellogg, against a number of congressmen who secured expedition for star route contracts, and were paid for it by contributions from the contractors to their campaign funds. That was the way in which Kellog got his $1,000 from Price. It is barely possible that other congressmen may be indicted on similar grounds.

The prisoners now in Kilmainham jail have given evidence to the authorities which throws complete light on the subject of the inquiry opened by Curran, into the murders in Dublin during the past year of persons who have turned informers.

Senator Wm. Pitt. Kellogg Indicted in Washington.

Washington Special: Ex-Senator William Pitt Kellogg was quite confident up to Wednesday afternoon that none of the persentments made against him by the grand jury of the district a few weeks ago would ever bear fruit in indictments. Nevertheless, the grand jury came into court this afternoon and reported an indictment against Kellogg and another against Brady. Kellogg is charged with having received five instalments of $1,500 each in lawful money as a consideration for using his influence, while in the United States senate, with Brady, to secure the expedition of certain routes, the following is a statement of what the government's counsels believe to be the facts in the case:

Price had attempted without success to get an allowance for an expedition in connection with these two routes. He then took the papers to Kellogg and promised to give him $20,000 if he would procure expedition of the routes. Kellogg told him to leave the papers and to call in two days. At the appointed time he returned and Kellogg told him it was all right; that expedition would be granted. Price thereupon sat down and drew five drafts upon the auditor of the treasury for a total of $15,000, against his pay for service on the San Antonio and Shreveport routes. For the remaining $5,000 he gave a note, indorsed by another mail contractor which was paid at maturity. The drafts were to be paid on April 19, July 14, Oct. 18, 1880, and Jan. 14, and April 27, 1881. Kellogg gave him to Walsh, and requested him to collect them, pay him (Kellogg) $1,500 for each draft, and credit Brady, who owed money to Walsh, with the same amount. Walsh collected the drafts as they matured, and, upon the collection of each draft, paid Kellogg $1,500 and credited Brady with $1,500.

Iowa Cyclone and Waterspout.

A cyclone and waterspout passed through the eastern part of Woodbury and Mona counties Saturday evening, causing the destruction of property and injuring of people. The house of a family named Kissinger, three miles east of Correctionville was taken up by a funnel shaped cloud, carried eight rods and thrown down, much damaged. The eight people in the house were all somewhat bruised, but none seriously injured. A barn was completely demolished, and wagons and agricultural implements were blown entirely away. Eight horses in the barn were uninjured. The village of Danbury was struck by the same cyclone. The Catholic church—costing $3,000—was entirely destroyed. Three houses and several barns were demolished. The people had warning after the coming of the wind, and fled to cellars. All escaped. The house of George Spencer, six miles east of Mapleton, Monona county, was struck and destroyed. Spencer was somewhat hurt, and Mrs. Spencer, ill with childbirth, was badly injured. Four children were more or less injured. The total destruction of property is estimated at $15,000.

ANOTHER IRISH INFORMER.

Lynch, Alias Norman, Turns Informer Against His Fellow Dynamite Prisoners in London.

A special dated London, April 19, says: Norman, Dalton, Wilson, Dr. Gallagher, Curtin, Ansburgh and Whitehead, the eight arrested on charge of being concerned in the dynamite conspiracy, were again brought up in the Bow street police court this morning. It was noticed as a significant fact that Norman was conveyed to the court room by a detective separately from the other prisoners. Whitehead who was brought here from Birmingham for trial, protested against handcuffs. He declared the entrance to the court room was the "Gate of hell." On the prisoners being arraigned in the court room, it was announced that Norman had turned informer. The rest of the prisoners, including Bernard Gallagher and Whitehead, were formerly charged with treason and felony. Poland, in opening the case for the crown, said he had a quantity of fresh evidence against the prisoners which would be furnished at the proper time.

Norman testified that:

His real name was William Joseph Lynch, born of Irish parents in the state of New York. He worked in October last at a coach builder's in Brooklyn. A shopmate, Daniel O'Connor, induced him to join a secret society, a branch Fenian organization, divisions of which were called Emerald clubs. O'Connor took him to Odd Fellows hall, New York, and in the ante room told him the object of the society was to free Ireland by force alone. Lynch, in joining the society, took an oath to stand by its watchward, obey his superior officers, and observe the laws of the brotherhood. The members were known by numbers. The name of the presiding officer was Thomas Burns. Lynch attended called meetings of the club twice each month; didn't know O'Donovan Rossa personally but heard he had been to the club room. He was always spoken of there as the "old man." Knew, besides O'Connor, two members of the club both named Sullivan. The number of the treasurer of the club was 82, and of the secretary 13. The password for admission to the meetings was "Providence." There were other associated clubs in New York: The Sarsfield, Thirty Second street, over Roe & Thomas Davis' military hall; the Emmett, Eighth avenue, and Davitt and Tom Moore clubs. The district members were not known to each other. When a member was wanted to go on a mission the president read out his number and told him to send the president his address.

He (Lynch) was sent to Dr. Thomas Gallagher, who lives on Manhattan avenue at Green Point, L. I. Gallagher told him he was to go to London; he would know what for when he got there. Gallagher gave him $50 and told him to take steerage passage by the steamer Spain, under the name of Norman. Gallagher gave him $100 more and told him to go to London and inquire at the American exchange for a letter addressed to him. Lynch did not want to go as he had relatives to support, but finally went. Gallagher gave him a small box. He examined this on the steamer and finding it contained a spring which worked by pressure became alarmed and threw it into the sea. Lynch reached London March 2-, and met Gallagher in London the 27th or 28th. They walked past the scene of the Westminster explosion. On his asking Gallagher if "that's what we are going to do" the latter answered "yes." Gallagher viewed the houses of parliament and said, "They will make a great crash when they come down." At this point Gallagher shouted out from the dock: "You are an infamous liar!" Lynch replied with a statement of Gallagher as to what destruction was to be wrought Gallagher and the witness passed Scotland yards and Gallagher said "That is the headquarters of detectives, and that will come down too." Gallagher said he was staying at Charing Cross hotel, and gave the witness £7, saying, "Don't run short, the old man will provide for us." Lynch went to Birmingham to see to Whitehead's request for some material. Gallagher gave him money to buy a presentable trunk in which to put the stuff he was to get from Whitehead. Whitehead put him in the way of getting India rubber bags. Lynch confirmed all the evidence submitted at the hearing last Thursday as to Gallagher having called for him as Fletcher. He said when Whitehead was loading the nitro-glycerine into the rubber bags he told Lynch that fifty pounds had been taken away that morning. Whitehead also said he would soon know what the liquid was. Whitehead here shouted, "You lie! you traitor!" Lynch further testified that Gallagher met him when he returned to London from Birmingham with nitro-glycerine. He had never seen any of the persons before except Gallagher and Whitehead. Lynch identified a boy he saw with Whitehead in the factory of the latter in Burmingham. The witness had never seen any of the persons before except Gallagher and Whitehead. Both spoke of sending another man to London, but did not mention any name.

The witness spoke in a weak and indistinct voice, and at one time appeared about to faint. At the conclusion of the testimony, and while depositions were being read, he did faint, and was removed from the court room. Bernhard Gallagher states that he is a native of Scotland, and returned from America to work as an iron molder. His brother, Dr. Gallagher, paid his passage. Bernard is ignorant of the doctor's business. Bernard says he was not a Fenian or a member of any secret society. He declares he was in Sing Sing, N. Y., at the time of the explosion in Glasgow.

The London Times says:

If Lynch's evidence can be satisfactorily proved, and it can be shown that O'Donovan Rossa furnished the large sum of money found on Dr. Gallagher, it will be a question for consideration whether O'Donovan Rossa cannot, by some sort of international proceedure, be made amendable to the laws of the empire. The Irish conspirators must be considered criminals and not beligerents.

Magnificent Mantle of an Empress.

The magnificent mantle which the czarina will wear at the coming coronation is made of cloth of gold bordered with armorial bearings embroidered in silk and gems. The crown placed on her head will be the one used at the coronation of the Empress Catherine II. and Elizabeth. Its value is estimated at three millions of roubles, and is composed of diamonds, rubies, and a large number of pearls. In her sceptre will blaze the great Orloff diamond, which is said to weigh eight carats more than the Koh-i-noor. The procession will consist of thirty-three carriages. That of the the czarino was made at Berlin by the orders of Frederick the Great and presented by him to the Empress Elizabeth. It is a kind of double throne without springs, but hung on four bands of red velvet. A single window, framed in white satin, forms the front, and the imperial eagles and the crown set in brilliants adorn the panels. It will be drawn by eight white horses, caparisoned with red velvet and flashing with gold and precious stones.

A FEARFUL CYCLONE.

Its Horrors in Mississippi—Loss of a Great Many Lives—Destruction of Towns.

Jackson, Miss., Special: At 4 o'clock Sunday evening a fearful cyclone passed over Beauregard and Wesson, contiguous towns forty miles below here, on the New Orleans railroad. The wind had been blowing a gale for three days. A rumbling sound and violent shaking of houses, heralded the approach of the cyclone, and caused intelligent people to believe it was an earthquake. Then thunder, lightning, wind and rain came with terrific force, sweeping everything in their path. In the western part of Wesson fences were tore down. Trees that had stood storms for ages were uprooted and hurled 100 yards. Houses on Peach Orchard street, where operatives of Mississippi mills domiciled, were demolished. A pine forest adjacent to town was blown out of existence. At this hour thirteen are known to be killed and wounded; estimated number seventy-five. Several are missing. Fifteen or twenty dwellings were blown down in the eastern portion, but not much damaged. As soon as the storm had somewhat abated and people began to look about, loud peals from the church bells rang out, and people were seen running in all directions toward West Wesson. The rain meantime was pouring in torrents. Reaching Peach Orchard street, an indescribable scene was witnessed. Here the greatest destruction occurre. People were seen on all sides sobbing, and the groans of the wounded beneath the ruins were perfectly appalling. The work of removing the dead and extricating the wounded from the ruins then began. The wounded were removed as fast as possible to houses which escaped injury. Several of the dead lay out in the violent rain for more than an hour after the catastrophe. One little boy was found in the woods. He had been blown several hundred yards unhurt. Beauregard, a mile north of Wesson, has about 900 inhabitants, and was entirely swept away. The destruction to life and property is indescribably appalling. Not a house of any kind is left standing. Large brick buildings were blown down; frame houses torn to atoms; trees swept away like straws; loaded freight cars lifted from the track and carried 200 yards; and trees timber from houses were scattered for miles around.

Aside from the losses in the towns mentioned the devastation of of the country in the path of the hurricane was very great—crops, farm houses and stock, with some loss of life.

A special reports the passage of a cyclone through the lower part of Georgia with destructive results, also very general wind and heavy rains all over the State. At a negro church a short distance from Starkville, Miss., a negro man was taken bodily up. The last seen of him he was high up, wildly beating the air as if seeking something to stay his progress.

The extreme southern portion of the city of Aberdeen, Miss., commonly known as freedman's town was almost entirely destroyed. Many cattle were killed. Eight or ten negroes were killed and fifty wounded, some of whom will probably die.

COMMERCIAL.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—Nothing done. Chicago was fluctuating, prices running up and down alternately. A stronger feeling prevailed among the holders, though the demand was not increased. Bids generally were higher, but hardly up with sellers' figures. The market closed quiet and firm. No. 1 hard, $1.10 bid, $1.12 asked; May, $1.15 asked; year, $1 bid; No. 2 hard, $1.05; No. 2, $1; No. 3, 85c; No. 4, 70c; rejected, 60c.

CORN—Sellers asked stronger prices, but buyers bid lower figures. There was a little demand, but operators were slow in meeting the views of holders, and consequently the market was quiet. Sir Philip Rose, the legal adviser of the English Tory party, is dead.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

Judge Collins of St. Cloud.

Gov. Hubbard has appointed Capt. L. W. Collins of St. Cloud, to fill the unexpired term of Judge McKelvey, resigned. The contest was long, and but for the agreement that had been arrived at between the parties, would probably not have been ended yet. Both candidates finally made a joint call upon the governor, and after stating that it was desirable that the judgeship should remain in St. Cloud, requested him to appoint one of the two from that city. He complied as above stated.

Loren W. Collins is a New Englander by birth, having first seen the light of day on the 22d of August, 1839, in the city of Lowell, Mass., and is consequently in his forty-fourth year. He received the benefit of the common schools, coming to Minnesota with his father in 1854 and locating at Eden Prairie, Hennepin county. After a few years more in school, he went to Hastings, where he studied law with Smith and Crosby. He was thus engaged when the first call for troops to quell the southern uprising was made, and, although yet a boy, enlisted as a private in the Seventh Minnesota regiment, serving until he was mustered out in 1865. Returning to Minnesota, he resumed his legal studies, locating in St. Cloud in 1866, at which time he commenced the practice of his profession, and where he has ever since remained. He has held local offices and was a member of the legislature of 1881-2 and 3.

Horrible Development of a Mystery.

Avoca, Murray county, special. The body of Mrs. A. Bengtran was found Monday, buried in the southeast corner of the stable. She was the wife of A. Bengtran, who committed suicide last August, by cutting his throat with a razor. He murdered his wife and buried her, and circulated the story that she had run away. Her best clothes were missing at the time, but were found in the walls of the barn. The cause of murder was domestic troubles. A revolver was found hid in the cellar with one chamber discharged. A large bullet hole was found in the back of the woman's head, which was made by the bullet.

The county auditor's office of North Pacific Junction was burglarized recently. Two safes were blown open and robbed of what currency and valuables were in them. Entrance was effected by prying open a rear window. The work was done by drilling into the locks and exploding a large charge of powder in each. The doors were blown to pieces. As near as can be ascertained, County Auditor Hankins lost some $200 in currency and a watch and chain left with him for safe keeping. A package containing $2,500 in county and town orders was opened and strewn over the floor. The order book, in which was drawn some $600 in county orders, was untouched.

The Henderson postoffice was broken into early Tuesday morning and $200 in postage stamps and about $25 in cash stolen therefrom. The burgler drilled a half-inch hole through the top of the safe, dropped powder, touched it off and sent the safe door flying through a wooden partition [illegible] feet from the front of the safe and breaking through the counter on which the postoffice boxes stand. The books and papers in the safe were powder burned and blackened.

The losses by the late fire at Wells, [illegible] bault Co., are as follows: W. B. [illegible], buildings, $1,000; no insurance. J. [illegible], buildings and law books, $400. [illegible] Pettingill, building, $720; stock and [illegible] $350; building insured in the Am[illegible] Philadelphia, Pa., for $500; stock [illegible] sured. Southwick, damage to bui[illegible] outhouses, $250; fully insured in the [illegible] Fire Insurance company. Adv[illegible] in type and furniture, $1,000; [illegible] Loss of household furniture of [illegible] ing in buildings, about $300. [illegible] families were turned into the street and are stopping with friends, as it is impossible to rent a house in town. This is the second time the Advocate has been burned out in the last three months, but the proprietors say they will not miss an issue if they can get a tent to put up their presses in.

Hon. George W. Braley, who controlled the Redwood County Gazette of Redwood Falls, and dealt extensively in stock, is dead. He was a member of the legislature of 1881.

The body of Elizabeth Lundell, a young woman, who with two others was drowned last fall, while attempting to cross Lake Pepin on the ice, was found just below Lake City recently.

Bellsie Johnson of St. Paul, has commenced suit for divorce against Nels Johnson. The complaint states that the plaintiff is eighteen and the defendant twenty-five years of age They were married Nov. 25, 1882; that prior to the marriage he threatened to kill her if she did not marry him, and so intimidated her and her parents that they compelled her to marry him. Since their marriage he has treated her cruelly, and during December he struck and threatened to kill her and drove her from the house.

While out hunting on Sunday last William Gilbert of Milion, Dodge county, was killed by the accidental discharge of a companion's gun.

The damages by the late storm at Zumbro Falls are thus given: E. A. Heradon, store wrecked and loss to stock, estimates his damage at $700; F. Sugg, on buildings, $700; A. Scholar, barn destroyed, $200; Dr. H. N. Rogers, loss on stock, $50; front of store smashed in, loss to Scholar, $75; bridge across Zumbro, $4,300; W. H. Bright, damage to house, $100; J. W. Dale, wagon shop blown down, $250; P. Ingalls, barn torn down, $20. The church was slightly damaged. School house entirely demolished loss $500; Mrs. E. J. Bint, front blown in, $25. P. Drinkwater sustains a damage of about $400, in that his fine barn was wrenched and twisted all out of shape. N. Radabaugh's house was also lifted up and set off from the foundation, wrenching the building and making the same almost worthless by reason of the removal.

With the exception of $5,000, and two towns yet to vote, the amount of bonds required to be voted in order to secure the building of the St. Cloud, Mankato & Austin road has been voted. Work upon the road, it is expected, will be commenced within thirty days after the $5,000 balance has been voted.

Articles incorporating the Crookston (Minn.) Agricultural association, with a capital stock of $5,000 have been filed with he secretary of state.

The fire at Albert Lea recently, caused an aggregate loss of $17,500, on which there was less than $4,000 insurance.

Lamberton Commercial. Recently as Miles Martin of Willow Lake, in this county, was driving home his cattle, some one came behind him and put two charges of shot in his back. The party suspected is old man Sperling; he and Martin had some difficulty a few days previous. Martin's injuries are severe, but not dangerous.

The laborers of Christopher & Morris, Minneapolis contractors, employed upon the new court house at Brainerd have struck for higher wages demanding an advance from $1.55 to $2, which is refused.

A Bad Man in Hayes Town.

George J. Krebs, postmaster at Tremont, O., is deficient in his accounts to the amount of $40,000. Steps have been taken to remove him. Difficulties in settlement led to an investigation by the government inspector, with the above result. The department at Washington will not say yet whether criminal proceedings will be instituted.

General Jo. Shelby having been mentioned as a democratic candidate for governor of Missouri, declines in favor of John S. Marmaduke, another ex-confederate general.

William Ott of St. Paul, while on a spree blew out his brain with a gun.

This issue closes the sixth year of the existence of THE JOURNAL. Established in 1877, THE JOURNAL has seen Polk County grow from a few hundreds to many thousands, with cities and villages now as numerous as its inhabitants were then. Crookston, then a hamlet of about 150, now boasts of about 5,000 inhabitants. THE JOURNAL is the pioneer newspaper in a county that now has eight newspapers. As heretofore THE JOURNAL will ever zealously watch over and guard the interests of Polk County with a jealous eye and everything that tends to advance the interests of our county shall have our earnest and most hearty support. Starting with a list of less than 100 subscribers our patronage has been so generous as to require the use of a power press to work off our edition and our list is still increasing for which we wish to return our heartfelt thanks to our generous patrons. We shall ever strive to merit and receive the most liberal patronage.

IMPROVEMENTS

ON THE

Broad Gauge Principle

INAUGURATED BY THE

CROOKSTON Improvement Company.

Flour Mills, Foundry and Machine Shops Positively Assured. More than 25 Houses to be Erected on Sampson's Addition.

Saturday, a week ago was a busy day with the Crookston Improvement Company. The noon train brought in a delegation of twelve or fifteen from St. Paul and Minneapolis, among whom were some of the principal stockholders in the Crookston Improvement Company and the balance capitalists and prospectors who come to look at Crookston and her advantages for capital and energy. The rain, which began on Friday continued through Saturday, and our city presented anything but an inviting appearance. Rubber boots was the order of the day, and many of the gentlemen came prepared for such an emergency, which showed plainly to the JOURNAL reporter that they had been there before. After dinner the entire party started for the railroad bridge, which they crossed, and meandered the ver down toward the dam, and into mpson's Addition. The rain was uring down but that did not in the t bother the party which proceeded n up streets, blocks and alley lines make notes of various lots and ks. The entire afternoon was thus and the party returned thoroughly . In the evening the City Council special meeting at which Mr. Sampson presented the plat of his addition which was accepted.

Mr. Wilcken, one of the principal stock owners in the mill and townsite presented letters from the President of the German American Bank, St. Paul, which showed Mr. Wilcken to be a responsible and reliable man. Mr. J. M. Waldron, of Minneapolis representing a syndicate of investors stated to the Council that he had made extensive selections of property in the new addition, and would, on behalf of himself and friends, make substantial improvements, in buildings and otherwise, provided he could be assured of a bridge, and furthermore that the entire project so far as his syndicate was concerned depended entirely on whether there would be a bridge or not. This brought out a varying discussion in a general way on the subject of bridge, but no action was taken as no definite proposition was made.

Subsequent to the meeting of the Council, the townsite proprietors held a meeting and among other things, decided to at once build six dwelling houses on Sampson's Addition, and we understand plans are now being prepared. The Waldron Syndicate also stand ready to commence improvements, but, very naturally protests against being compelled to incur the extra expense of hauling the material all the way around by the present bridge, and through Sampson's farm. Property in the Woodland Addition has scarcely been on the market a week, and still over one hundred lots have been sold, and a very considerable proportion, with a view of improvement, and several of the resident purchasers have expressed a wish to begin building at once, to enable them to finish their houses and get settled by early fall. There has never, in the history of the city any property been offered, which has been so eagerly taken by the most intelligent class of people, and for actual improvements.

Little if indeed any, speculative feeling has been manifested and the most conservative have purchased because they wanted desirable residence locations, eligibly and convenient. It has been, not only understood, but guaranteed by the townsite proprietors, that a bride would be this season and purchasers who have this guarantee are anxious to see the word started, with the hope and expectation that the bridge will be finished in time to use in landing building material on the ground.

It is confidently asserted that, with a bridge built early in the season, say finished by September 1st, the amount of improvements this year, in Woodland Addition, including flour mill, foundry and dwellings, will not fall far short of an even one hundred thousand dollars.

From what the JOURNAL knows of the gentlemen composing the Crookston Improvement Company, they do not propose to fold their hands, and sit still waiting the completion of a bridge. They intend to push right ahead with their improvements, and are willing to leave it to the intelligent voice of the people of Crookston to say, whether or not the improvements in progress, and the number and character of the future residents of Woodland Addition, are such as to warrant a bridge. It is fortunate for the true interests of our city that the Council is made up of practical business men, who can not be moved by the outside pressure of parties whose property does not join, nor is adjacent to Woodland Addition, and who would rather see these improvements made in Calcutta, than on the other side of the river. These parties take every occasion, and in fact do not wait for opportunities to belittle these improvements and say they are made for a selfish purpose.

[illegible]

always willing to accord credit where due, has no hesitation in saying that the present work, and future plans of the Crookston Improvement Company is for the best interests of our city and community as it must add to our importance and will inaugurate a new era in the manufacturing industries in which Crookston, by her natural position and advantage must from this time make rapid strides. In view of this addition of taxable property added to the city, and the increased capital concentrated here the city can well afford to build a bridge at the west end of Robert Street, and if it should be found expedient to build a temporary bridge do so but a bridge of some sort should certainly be built even though it has to be substituted for a better one at some future time.

A fairminded, liberal policy on the part of the city will invite foreign capital, while a short-sighted economy will retard the growth and development of our beautiful young city. Our neighboring cities and towns are making strenuous efforts to get ahead of the race and secure to themselves a generous supply of the capital and labor which is now seeking an entrance and a location in the Red River Valley and it behooves Crookston to be up and doing, letting her light so shine that it may be seen and known unto all men, thus extending a friendly and cordial hand of welcome to all.

THOROUGHBREDS

BRAGGART.

Bred in Suffolk, England.
Sire, Cupbearer 3d.
Dam, Brag.
Grandsire, Cupbearer 2d.
Great-Grandsire, Cupbearer 1st.

This magnificent Stallion will stand during the season at the Furlong Ramsa Farm to serve a limited number of mares at $25 each and $1 groom's fees.

All mares covered by this horse to be paid for on first service.

Braggart is a handsome chestnut, 17 hands high, rising 4 years old, with wonderful bone and symmetry, great girth and find action.

His sires took first prize at the principal agricultural fairs in England, and his dam was also well known.

STRATHNAIRN.

Bred in Renfrewshie, Scotland.

Sire of dam, Lochfergus Champion.

This beautiful Stallion will stand during the season at the Furlong Ramsay Farm to serve a limited number of mares at $25 each, and $1 groom's fee.

All mares covered by this horse to be paid for on first service.

Strathnairn is a noble dark-brown Clydesdale, 17 hands high, rising 4 years old, of perfect shape, with wonderful power and grand action.

His sire was a well known prizetaker, and also his grandsire, who was one of the most celebrated horses of this day.

MASK.

Bred in Landashire, England.
Sire, Sir Colin.
Dam, Eva.
Sire of dam, Short Legs.

This handsome Stallion will stand during the season at the Furlong Ramsay Farm to serve a limited number of mares at $35 each, and $1 to the groom.

All mares covered by this horse to be paid for on first service.

Mask is a dark chestnut, 15¾ hands high, rising 4 years old; he stands on short legs, with finely developed quarters and magnificent knee action, well adapted to getting good driving stock.

His pedigree shows as good training as can be obtained in his class.

These horses were all imported from England last fall by the owners, and the greatest care was taken in their selection. ☞ They can be seen at any time by applying to F. HUGHES, Esq., Furlong Ramsay Farm, Warren, Marshall County, Minnesota, to whom all communications should be addressed.

P. J. McGUIRE, County Auditor.

The mud is fast drying up and, in a few days, if fine weather lasts, dust will be flying in our streets.

The Norman County Alert changed hands last week having been bought by Messrs. Lightbourn & Foote.

The Crookston Cornet Band has been organized. Tom Morris is President, Charlie Davis, Secretary and Treasurer and R. Brunner musical director. Erelong we shall hear the toot of the silver horn.

If you want to see one one of the finest Norman horses in the State go to Tom Bjoin's stable where you will find one. This horse arrived from Iowa on Friday evening and will remain in Polk County. Call at the stable and look him over.

The JOURNAL is in receipt of a 58 page pamphlet descriptive of the early days and early surveys of East New Jersey, with the compliments of the author, Mr. William Roome, of Pequanac N. J. The little book is very ably written and contains much interesting matter reaching back as far as the days of Charles II. Mr. Roome is a brother of J. R. Roome of this county.

Prof. Carruth has secured a session of the teacher's institute which will commence on June 11th, continuing one week. Prof T. J. Grey and Prof. J. T. McCleary are assigned as instructors. Arrangements will be made so that teachers who attend will be subject to no greater expense than the time required and their fare. As it has always been customary heretofore we presume half-fare will be secured on the railroad. There should be a large attendance.

A $20.00 Bible Reward.

The publishers of Rutledge's Monthly offer twelve valuable rewards in their Monthly for May, among which is the following:

We will give $20.00 in gold to the person telling us the which is the shortest chapter in the New Testament Scriptures (not the New Revision) by May 10th, 1883. Should two or more correct answers be received, the reward will be divided. The money will will be forwarded to the winner May 15th, 1883. Persons trying for the reward must send 20 cents in silver (no postage stamps taken) with their answer, for which they will receive the June Monthly, in which the name and address of the winner of the reward and the correct answer will be published, and in which several more valuable rewards will be offered. Address, RUTLEDGE PUBLISHING COMPANY, Easton, Penna. [51-52]

IMPROVEMENTS

ON THE

Broad Gauge Principle

INAUGURATED BY THE

CROOKSTON Improvement Company.

Flour Mills, Foundry and Machine Shops Positively Assured. More than 25 Houses to be Erected on Sampson's Addition.

Saturday, a week ago was a busy day with the Crookston Improvement Company. The noon train brought in a delegation of twelve or fifteen from St. Paul and Minneapolis, among whom were some of the principal stockholders in the Crookston Improvement Company and the balance capitalists and prospectors who come to look at Crookston and her advantages for capital and energy. The rain, which began on Friday continued through Saturday, and our city presented anything but an inviting appearance. Rubber boots was the order of the day, and many of the gentlemen came prepared for such an emergency, which showed plainly to the JOURNAL reporter that they had been there before. After dinner the entire party started for the railroad bridge, which they crossed, and meandered the river down toward the dam, and into Sampson's Addition. The rain was pouring down but that did not in the least bother the party which proceeded to run up streets, blocks and alley lines and make notes of various lots and blocks. The entire afternoon was thus spent and the party returned thoroughly soaked. In the evening the City Council held a special meeting at which Mr. Sampson presented the plat of his addition which was accepted.

Mr. Wilcken, one of the principal stock owners in the mill and townsite presented letters from the President of the German American Bank, St. Paul, which showed Mr. Wilcken to be a responsible and reliable man. Mr. J. M. Waldron, of Minneapolis representing a syndicate of investors stated to the Council that he had made extensive selections of property in the new addition, and would, on behalf of himself and friends, make substantial improvements, in buildings and otherwise, provided he could be assured of a bridge, and furthermore that the entire project so far as his syndicate was concerned depended entirely on whether there would be a bridge or not. This brought out a varying discussion in a general way on the subject of bridge, but no action was taken as no definite proposition was made.

Subsequent to the meeting of the Council, the townsite proprietors held a meeting and among other things, decided to at once build six dwelling houses on Sampson's Addition, and we understand plans are now being prepared. The Waldron Syndicate also stand ready to commence improvements, but, very naturally protests against being compelled to incur the extra expense of hauling the material all the way around by the present bridge, and through Sampson's farm. Property in the Woodland Addition has scarcely been on the market a week, and still over one hundred lots have been sold, and a very considerable proportion, with a view of improvement, and several of the resident purchasers have expressed a wish to begin building at once, to enable them to finish their houses and get settled by early fall. There has never, in the history of the city any property been offered, which has been so eagerly taken by the most intelligent class of people, and for actual improvements.

Little if indeed any, speculative feeling has been manifested and the most conservative have purchased because they wanted desirable residence locations, eligibly and convenient. It has been, not only understood, but guaranteed by the townsite proprietors, that a bride would be this season and purchasers who have this guarantee are anxious to see the word started, with the hope and expectation that the bridge will be finished in time to use in landing building material on the ground.

It is confidently asserted that, with a bridge built early in the season, say finished by September 1st, the amount of improvements this year, in Woodland Addition, including flour mill, foundry and dwellings, will not fall far short of an even $100,000.

From what the JOURNAL knows of the gentlemen composing the Crookston Improvement Company, they do not propose to fold their hands, and sit still waiting the completion of a bridge. They intend to push right ahead with their improvements, and are willing to leave it to the intelligent voice of the people of Crookston to say, whether or not the improvements in progress, and the number and character of the future residents of Woodland Addition, are such as to warrant a bridge. It is fortunate for the true interests of our city that the Council is made up of practical business men, who can not be moved by the outside pressure of parties whose property does not join, nor is adjacent to Woodland Addition, and who would rather see these improvements made in Calcutta, than on the other side of the river. These parties take every occasion, and in fact do not wait for opportunities to belittle these improvements and say they are made for a selfish purpose.

The JOURNAL being independent, and always willing to accord credit where due, has no hesitation in saying that the present work, and future plans of the Crookston Improvement Company is for the best interests of our city and community as it must add to our importance and will inaugurate a new era in the manufacturing industries in which Crookston, by her natural position and advantage must from this time make rapid strides. In view of this addition of taxable property added to the city, and the increased capital concentrated here the city can well afford to build a bridge at the west end of Robert Street, and if it should be found expedient to build a temporary bridge do so but a bridge of some sort should certainly be built even though it has to be substituted for a better one at some future time.

A fairminded, liberal policy on the part of the city will invite foreign capital, while a short-sighted economy will retard the growth and development of our beautiful young city. Our neighboring cities and towns are making strenuous efforts to get ahead of the race and secure to themselves a generous supply of the capital and labor which is now seeking an entrance and a location in the Red River Valley and it behooves Crookston to be up and doing, letting her light so shine that it may be seen and known unto all men, thus extending a friendly and cordial hand of welcome to all.

State Teachers' Institute.

An Institute for the County of Polk will be held at Crookston, during the week commencing Monday, June 11, 1883.

It will be under the supervision of the County Superintendent, who will make all necessary arrangements for the convenience of teachers and the success of the Institute. Instructors, thoroughly prepared for the work, will be provided; they will be furnished with such professional books, apparatus and literature as will be of special service to teachers. Lectures and discussions will be appointed for some of the evenings, and everything possible be done to fill the week with valuable matter. Good teachers, and those ambitious to improve, cannot afford to absent themselves.

The school officers of the best districts [illegible] who take part in the institutes, and those who never attend [illegible] not likely to gain prominence as enterprising teachers, or to deserve any party endorsement from the superintendent.

Give the superintendent timely notice of your intention to be present, and ask him for a syllabus of the work to be done.

Work will begin promptly Monday afternoon, and close Friday Evening. Be on hand at the beginning. Plan to stay the entire week and let nothing prevent giving your undivided attention to its duties.

D. L. KIEHLE,
Supt. Public Instruction.

V. D. CARRUTH,
County Superintendent.

Budweisser and Anheuser bottled beer at Charlie Seely's.

A six foot walking bridge will be laid across the dam as soon as practicable.

Seven carloads of ties for the St. Hilaire branch passed north to Shirley on Saturday.

Ira Kidder is raising a trotter. One morning last week he found himself richer by a fine thrifty colt.

Hundreds of fish are being taken from the river in these days. "The boss place is above the dam." So sayeth ye small boy.

The Pathfinders gave an entertainment on Thursday evening last. We were not in attendance but were told that it was excellent.

A. Akerlund has just finished a neat screen for Ole Bang. It is a triumph of art and shows that Gus has not forgotten his skill as a workman.

Geo. Driver goes into the building recently occupied by T. Thebeault. He will fix it up in nobby style and soon be ready to receive his friends.

The city has been doing good work upon the streets, harrowing and rolling down the hubs and filling the ruts.

Fifteen or twenty tramps graced the halls of the city cooler on Sunday. That bird is getting numerous of late.

Schlitz and LaCrosse bottled beer at Seely's.

C. C. Utzinger, W. O. Wilson, and several others from St. Hilaire, have been in the city enjoying the sunshine of civilizaton awhile this week.

Ralph E. Arnold, aged five years, son of W. F. Arnold, arrived in the city on Saturday from a winter's visit to grandpa's. The little fellow takes the road early.

Mr. Beecher rejoices in the arrival of his wife from Binghampton N. Y. They will go to house keeping in one of the Erskine cottages near the school house.

The McKinnon Bros. have the boss roller. They are taking many orders and are prepared to supply all that will be needed.

Tim Bjoin lost a valuable horse on Saturday last. In some unaccountable way it got a leg broke while in its stall, and had to be shot.

The choicest Crookston beer always on draught at Seely's place.

In cigars, Charlie Seely has "The Colonel," "Seelys Own," Minnesota Star," "De Capo" and hundreds of choice brands too numerous to mention which to see is to covet and to sample is to enjoy.

The Crookston Restaurant under Dan McKinnon's excellent management has lost none of the reputation made for it by Charlie Robbecke. It is first-class in every particular and fully up with the times.

A slight flurry of snow, about equal to a heavy frost, fell on Monday night, causing a few farmers to look a little blue. However it lasted pretty quick when the sun came out and now all is O. K.

Charle Seely's lunch table is still as slick and as attractive as ever.

Every train brings from a dozen to fifty anxious seekers after a home and wealth in Polk County, and those who remain are wise. It is here that both may be found by earnest application and strict attention to business.

Work upon the streets in Sampson's Addition has been commenced. Building is going ahead rapidly. We are informed that the survey to the spur track is nearly completed and that work upon the track will immediately follow.

Rev. S. N. Griffith and family arrived from Stephen's Point, Wis., on Thursday and go to the farm at Euclid. Mr. G. will have charge of the Fisher schools while his family will remain upon and cultivate the farm at Euclid.

A. Anderson came over from Grafton last week where he has been a few days attending to horse sales. He says his sales there are numerous but he thinks old Polk County gets away with the world for a fine country. He goes back to Iowa until after seeding.

Mr. S. A. Farnsworth arrived on Saturday last and took charge of our city schools, as principal, on Monday morning. We bespeak for Mr. F. a hearty welcome as he is a gentleman worthy and well qualified to fill the position of principal of our schools worthily and with acceptance to all.

F. T. Haseltime has arrived from a winter's sojourn at Madison, Wisconsin, right on deck for a big summer's trade. He says that the nursery business last year was a grand success, and that this year's record will beat that two to one. The Haseltine Brothers have worked hard and deserve the success they are meeting with.

John Kahler, of Red Lake Falls dropped down on Monday. John is one of the oldest inhabitants of the Falls and says never before was the progress so great as now. The little city is a gem and we are pleased at her evident prosperity. By the aid of her Messenger, (which by the way, Rompletz has wonderfully improved) she ought soon to rank among the important cities of the plains and we doubt not that she will.

On Saturday night a burglar went to burgling in Cowing Bros. hardware store. He very neatly and dextrously cut out a large pane of glass large enough to admit of his entrance, laid the pieces of glass carefully down went in and took a handsome double barrelled shot gun which cost $35 and two revolvers which cost $18

JENNING'S & MCGREW,

Attorneys at Law and Real Estate Dealers, Crookston, Minn. [46-tf]

Will Arnold has gone to St. Hilaire to see his folks for a few days.

Leech & McManus have taken possession of their new real estate office on Broadway.

The Broadway laundry has been moved into the rooms recently occupied by Leech & McManus.

The real estate exchange office takes a back seat. It has been removed to rear of a saloon on Main Street.

J. L. Baily has taken possession of his new store on Broadway and is now living at home on his own claim.

A band of Italion harpists have been harping on our streets and making music for the boys for a week back.

Dept Sheriff A. N. Hopkins put his teams to work seeding north of the city about two miles on Wednesday.

Hans Johnson has finished sowing his wheat we are told, and has nearly completed the balance of his seeding.

Farmers are busy improving this fine weather. Thousands of acres will go in this week. After all said and done the season is not so very far behind last year.

Mr. N. P. Johnson reports that he has his wheat all sown and has wheat up and growing nicely. He commenced sowing on April 9th.

W. H. McCulough has just finished painting the residence of M. E. Filliatrault, on Houston Avenue and a neat job it is. He has eleven men employed and is doing a good business.

The celebrated Anheuser & Busch bottled beer at Warninger & Trombley's. A carload just received and for sale at wholesale or retail. Families supplied on reasonable terms.

Gaze upon McKinnon Bros. broad gauge ad this week and go and see their stock of machinery, wagons, carriages etc., etc. The boys mean business and are fully up to the times, prepared to furnish all they advertise.

Geo. Driver is fixing up his new sample room neatly. It will be re-papered and re-painted will have a private parlor and will contain all the modern improvements. Geo. will try to open out on Monday next.

The Linton House sports a big sign which looms up conspicuously. A street lamp also tells you where you are on a dark night, when you are in front of the Linton House. The proprietors seem determined not to hide their light 'neath a bushel.

A. J. Clark, the Argyle boomer, took in the city this week. Clark tells a good yarn about how the boys amused him one day last winter at Charlie's, and how Sam Fowler kicked the covers, but as we dont know the story well enough to tell it you will have to ask A. J. or Sam how it was.

The Red River & Lake of the Woods Railroad Company held their annual meeting at the general office in this city on the 2d day of May 1883. The following named directors were duly elected for the ensuing year. Frank Ives, Jas. J. Hill, R. B. Galusha, A. H. Bode and Edward Sawyer. The officers of the company are the same as last years.

Bottled beer of all kinds always on hand; Crookston beer always on draught; the choicest wines, liquors and cigars always found at Warninger & Trombley's.

I am now prepared to take orders for the celebrated Beauty of Hebron potato. This potato is now the leading variety and is fast becoming a public favorite. I have about 500 bushels for sale at Minneapolis prices less the freight. Terms cash on delivery. Address AARON COOKE, JOURNAL office, Crookston, Minn. [1-4]

The Brainard Tribune, which for several years has slept in peace and quietness is about to be resurrected, and published under the name of the Northwestern Tribune. Geo. S. Canfield is the manager, and we are told that M. C. Russell will wield the editorial pen. The Tribune, under Mr. Russell was once one of the leading papers along the N. P. line and can be again. Success to the enterprise.

The real estate business is lively in a quiet sort of way. With no great parade or flourish of arms, lots are being sold every day and every dealer is confident of doing a large business this summer. All who intend to invest should not delay too long as lots in the several additions that are now going at first prices will soon double up in the hands of second parties. Good bargains can now be had for the taking. Catch on in time.

The Sunday liquor law, passed by the council, is a good one and meets with general approval. It always seemed to us to be a hardship to require men in that line to be in the harness all of the time, nights and Sundays, with no rest, but now our councilmen have said that even saloon men have some rights that a white man is bound to respect—the right to rest nights and Sundays. Now, extend the Sunday law into every other line of business, gentlemen, and it will be indeed a happy thought.

We are informed that the large Keystone farm, near Euclid that heretofore every spring has been too wet to sow until quite late, this spring is in fine condition for seeding and has been for some time owing to the ditching that was done there last summer. It is said that not one acre of the entire tract need be left on account of wet land. This one instance illustrates the importance of ditching and its benefits. It will not only add from 5 to 10 bushels per acre but will make the seasons at least two weeks earlier.

Joe Roberton and Robert Nesbit of the Marais, gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday. Joe reports that he has a field of wheat containing about 40 acres, that is up and growing finely. It was sowed on the 9th day of April. The boys report seeding well advanced in the Marais country, and the work is being pushed lively. Will be completed by the middle of May. The acreage sown will be larger than last year by one third. Ditching in that country leaving the land

The County Board meets next Tuesday, May 8th.

John Dillon will appear at Ericsson's Hall on the evening of Saturday May 12th.

Munn Bros. have fixed up their old shop and will call it a sample room futurely.

John B. Bottineau, of Minneapolis was in the city on Tuesday on-route to Red Lake Falls.

J. G. McGrew has sold his interest in Jerome's Addition to G. M. Barber, receiving we are told $6,000.

Lace curtains and kid gloves cleaned equal to new at the Broadway laundry, two doors north of the Clements Block.

Elias Steenerson, of Fisher, shows his faith in our city by purchasing six lots on Sampson's Addition on Thursday morning.

Where the crocus blooms, where the robin sings, where the bull frog never comes, on the Woodland Addition. Leech & McManus, Red Star Office, Broadway.

W. H. McCulough has men at work ornamenting the sides of Seely's exchange with all sorts of signs. Charlie will look like a circus when he comes out of that.

Barber & Co will soon be able to take possession of their new drug store on Second Street. Boss Hinman has men employed upon the finishing or "rounding up" as you might say.

You intend to get a lot in Sampson's Addition AFTER A WHILE. W-e-ll perhaps you will, if present buyers feel inclined to sell. Leech & McManus, Red Star Office, Broadway.

Geo. Warninger's new residence is up and Jos Netzer is rushing it to completion at a rapid rate. Soon George will be able to boast of as fine a residence as the city affords.

Mr. E. C. Turner, representing the Minnesota Historical company, of Minneapolis is canvassing our city for Neill's History of Minnesota. He is taking many subscribers and deservedly so for the work is a meritorious one.

Don't be in a hurry to buy in Sampson's Addition. First buyers will have plenty of lots for sale there in a month from this at from 100 to 150 per cent. higher than you can buy from proprietors. Leech & McManus, Broadway.

Ed Walsh has purchased the residence of Judge Reynolds on Houston Avenue for the sum of $4000, and will move into it soon. We are told that the Judge and family will board this summer and will spend next winter in Florida.

We notice that the "Red Front" is to rent. This we gathered from a buletin board decorated with some kind of hieroglyphics very much resembling Choctaw, Heathen Chinee, or someother d-d (which means dead) language. (No charges on this local but C. C. will rent the building twice as quick as he would without it.)

Jeome Brothers have their new meat market nearly ready and will open for business on Saturday the 5th inst. In addition to fresh and salt meats and every thing in that line they will keep a full line of vegetables in their season. All orders will be promptly delivered to any part of the city.

The city authorities have done a good thing by leveling the streets with harrows and smoothing them with a roller. Now the next thing should be to open out the ditches and round up the center of the streets which by long usage have flattened out considerabl. Let this be done and Crookston will have the best streets of any city in the Northwest.

On account of the crowd of would-be buyers in Sampson's Addition, who have visited us with One Hundred Dollar Williams in their outstretched hands, we have been obliged to move to more commodious quarters where we can be found, all night, all day, dishing out lots to the down trodden poor. Leech & McManus, Red Star Office, Broadway.

Hack & Gallasch have bought the small building just south of the Merchants Hall on Main Street and moved it across the street just north of their store. We were unable to ascertain what disposition they will make of it, unless it be true as John told our reporter, that Gallasch is going to start a 1st National bank in there. We are inclined to doubt it somewhat because there are one or two smaller houses in the city that could be had cheaper.

Parties seeking investment in city property in the Northwest should compare the streets of our city with those of every other city in the Northwest. While others have been knee deep in mud our streets have been passable all of the spring and for the most part reasonably dry and smooth. Located as we are, with natural drainage this is not a matter of surpries and it is a fact that will always remain true. It is worthy of consideration and our city is rapidly growing by reason of it.

Mr. John Knuppe has accepted the position of agent for the sale of lands for the St. Paul & Manitoba company and has secured pleasant office rooms over the Merchants Bank. Mr. Knuppe is well known as the former Land Commissioner of the road and being well versed in the business will make a capital man for the position. He is also personally interested in the future of this country and has spent much time and taken great pains in its developement. He has prepared a work for publication showing the country as it is, which is to be circulated extensively in Europe for immigration purposes.

ALDAL, May 1st 1883.

May opens up with a sprinkling of new snow and decidedly cold weather. Seeding is put back considerably, though we presume most of it will be done by the end of this week.

The high water in the river is slowly receding and the condition of the roads consequently improving.

Born to Mr. and Mrs. Knut Nelson, on the 22d of April, a son.

The dam on J. Aldal's mill site has withstood the shock of the high water and Mr. Aldal will soon be able to resume the work of sawing lumber. He has a splendid water power and it would be a good location for a flouring mill.

Considerable children's diseases prevails in this neighborhood at present and Dr. A. Nelson is kept busy. The Dr. is having a large practise.

Knut Nelson our enterprising merchant has recently employed several men in the work of ditching and clearing off brush on his valuable farm. That kind of investment we are sure will pay. He has also just erected a large stable with room enough for several span of horses and strangers traveling with teams and wanting to stop over night at this place will now find the former want of stable room done away with.

Knut A. Horvig, a brother of Brown A. Horvig, the popular clerk at Knut Nelson's, has just arrived from Wisconsin.

Quite a number of emigrants from the old country are expected here this spring and one has just arrived. He reports that times in Norway are decidedly hard and predicts a large emigration from that country to this, especially Northern Minnesota and Dakota during the spring and summer.

And still the industrious land hunter arrives and whatever little vacant land is left in the Sand Hill Valley will speedily be settled upon.

The Fertile correspondent in his letter of April 9th to the JOURNAL, makes a peculiar, and to him, not very creditable issue of the local struggle between said place and Aldal, by getting personal and throwing slurs at his neighbors and business men of the latter place. He even takes one of the medical fraternity to task for having "taken a very delicate and dangerous operation," and advises the "Dr." (we presume he means Dr. A. Nelson,) "to let such things alone until he cuts his eye teeth." We can assure you, sir, that the Dr. has cut his eye teeth a long while ago, though we presume that you, not being a professional man, must be an expert, eminently capable of criticising "very delicate and dangerous surgical operations," we also presume that you have your eye teeth, but the verdancy of your critic indicates that your eye sight is blurred by hay seed considerably and we most respectfully recommend you to have an operation performed for that troublesome complaint. With regard to the opposition of license you are not well informed, and for your kind fatherly advice to certain gentlemen, "to go slow and not violate the expressed will of the people, and on his of office," those gentlemen are very much obliged. Besides having made your debut to the public as a professional critique, we would suggest, sir, that you also enter into the private detective business. The people of Aldal will boom their place on its merits and not by such questionable means as slurring their neighbors.

VIKING.

Pianos and Organs.

At bottom prices and warranted satisfactory, at the American Office, Crookston, Minn.

By the receipt of cards, and a generous supply of wedding cake, we were reminded that our old time friend and enemy, Fremont E. Wood, formerly editor of the Detroit Record, had got weary of well doing and got married. (This reminds us of a passage to the effect of its being better for that man had he never been born, or words to that effect, but as we are doubtful whether it applies to such cases we will omit it.) While "Monte" was in charge of the Record we were the best of friends, quarrelling and wrangling all of the time and so we are now prepared to rejoice with him trusting that he may ever be as happy as he deserves which will be abundant as he is one of the largest-hearted boys in existence. Since leaving the newspaper business he has been telegraph operator at several points, holding positions of trust and honor with credit to himself and profit to his employers. He is now stationed at Niche, D. T., to which place he has taken his fair young bride for their future home. "Monte," the JOURNAL earnestly wishes you and yours a long and happy life. Here's our ☞.

COUNCIL PROCEEDINGS.

At the regular meeting held on the evening of April 24 h the following business was transacted:

Committee on abatement of taxes of L. Touchett reported unfavorably. On grading and sidewalks for Hunter Street favorably, and advertisement for bids ordered. Grading and sidewalks and extension of Main Street ordered also the same on Fine Street. Reports of committee on sidewalks for Broadway and extension of Elm Street were favorable. By resolution the petition of parties for building a bridge on the east end of Robert Street was allowed provided that said parties build a good, substantial bridge and maintain it for three years. Petition for grading on Cowing Street from Houston Ave. to Cromb Street with sidewalk on east side to Spendley Street, granted and bids ordered. Petition for alley in block 18 referred to proper committee. Proposition from J. R. Holton to run the city pump if city would build addition to pump house and allow him the use of it, was referred to Box, Hanscome and Braley. City printing awarded to W. R. Dunn. On opening the bids for building sidewalks the bid of S. W. Ritchie was accepted at $29.75 per M. for walks and $24.70 for crossings. Ordinance on liquor license passed. Petition for lottery rejected. A motion was made to shut off the wind from the outside which is a master-stroke and will save much wrangling by outsiders who generally have more or less chin music to ventilate. It provides that no person not a member of the council, shall debate upon any question without first obtaining permission from the presiding officer so to do. Motion prevailed. Bills to the amount of $145 50 allowed. Adjourned until April 27th.

April 27th, 1883.

Council met pursuant to adjournment at 8 p. m. Absent Mayor Stuart and alderman Stone. Alderman Pierce in the chair. Application of E. Bartway for liquor license presented and approved. Application of Phil McLaughlin to run city pump for $65 per month and house rent, tabled. Committee on settlement with city treasurer Ross, reported favorably, commending Mr. Ross very highly, recommending a vote of thanks for the efficient manner in which his duties as treasurer have been performed. Said vote of thanks was duly taken, every member of the council concurring. The city attorney and H. M. Pierce was appointed a committee to revise and compile the ordinances of the city and codify rules and order of business for the government of the city council. Committee on proposition of J. R. Holton reported favorably providing the house cost not to exceed $500. By resolution the council agreed that no business be transacted at any special meeting except that for which the meeting is called and that personal notice of such meeting be given each member prior to such meeting. J. R. Holton was appointed police officer without pay from the city. Adjourned till April 30th.

April 30th, 1883.

Council met pursuant to adjournment. All present except Aldermen Stone and Hanscome. Applications of Fulz Farnet, Geo. Driver, Toby Valnes, August Wentzel and Max Ericsson, for liquor license, with necessary bonds accepted and bonds approved. Draft of ordinance relating to punishment for misdemeanors, amending Ordinance No. 3, read and passed. Adjourned until the regular meeting on May 8th 1883.

IRISH NATIONAL LEAGUE.

The Great Convention at Philadelphia of Representative Irish Citizens of the United States.

Formation of a New League for United and Active Efforts in Behalf of Ireland.

The Convention of the Irish National Land League of America, held at Philadelphia on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. It consisted of duly accredited delegates from the various benevolent, charitable and other Irish societies in America. The call for this second convention states that its object is to be to form a new league after the plan of the national league of Ireland, which will blend into one organization, as Irish societies of the United States and Canada, the new organization to be affiliated with the Irish national league of Ireland. The principles of the Irish national league, which was formed in Dublin in October last was as follows: First, national self-government; second, land law reform; third, self-government; fourth, extension of parliamentary and municipal franchises; fifth, development and encouragement of the labor and industrial interests of Ireland. The Philadelphia convention was largely attended and was called to order by President James A. Mooney of Buffalo, of the Irish land league of the United States; secretary J. J. Hynes, of Buffalo, secretary of the Irish land league of the United States; assistant secretaries, William F. Sheehan of Buffalo and J. D. O'Connell of Washington. No vice presidents.

Mr. Mooney, on taking the chair made a very sensible speech. Various committees were appointed and financial and other reports received and accepted. The report of the secretary shows that during the year 1883, the new branches reported to the central office, and now on the national roll, number 550, of whose existence the central office has official knowledge, and 289 not known officially.

Total amount of money received by the secretary from April 11, 1882, to April 25, 883, was $79,038.

Among the committees appointed was the following, appointed to consider the method of merging the Land League with the new organization:

Arizona, James Redpath; Connecticut, James Reynolds; Georgia, Col. J. F. Armstrong; Illinois, Rev. Morris Downey; Indiana, James H. Allen; Iowa, M. V. Gannon; Kentucky, Matthew O'Dougherty; Louisiana, T. Mahoney; Maryland, Col. E. T. Joyce; Mich., Rev. Dr. Charles O'Reilly; Minnesota, M. C. McCarthy; Missouri, Dr. Thomas O'Reilly; Massachusetts, Rev. Father Conaty; Maine, John A. Gallagher; New Hampshire, William H. Gorman; New Jersey, John H. Sanderson; New York, D. C. Feely; Nebraska, John Fitzgerald; Ohio, Major John Byrne; Pennsylvania, Rev. Thomas Barry; Vermont, William Mullen; Rhode Island, Col. F. S. O'Reilly; South Carolina, M. M. Kennedy; Virginia, Patrick McGovern; Wisconsin, James G. Donnelly; District of Columbia, Arthur Rooney.

On Thursday the convention continued its session. Mrs. Delia Parnell entered, escorted by Alex. Sullivan of Chicago, who introduced her, amid applause, as "greater than the mother of the Gracchi." Mrs. Parnell was loudly cheered upon entering. On motion of Mr. V. Gannon of Iowa a resolution of respect and sympathy for mother Fanny Parnell was adopted by a rising vote. It is stated the central league of Boston would decorate Fanny Parnell's grave.

Permanent organization was effected with the following officers: chairman, M. A. Foren of Ohio; secretary, John J. Hyeres; assistant secretaries, John J. Wright of Michigan, Edward Fitzwilliams of Massachusetts, Cornelius Horan of Pennsylvania, J. D. O'Connell of Washington. A number of vice-presidents were also chosen.

The following telegram from Charles Stewart Parnell was read which is notable for its apparent deprecation of what is termed the dynamite policy. His most noteworthy recommendation is that the convention frame a platform that will encourage aid from America, while the British government should at the same time have no pretext for entirely suppresing the national movement in Ireland.

LONDON, April 26.—James Mooney, Esq., President of the Irish-American Convention, Philadelphia: My presence at the opening of the most representative convention of Irish-Americans, in my opinion, ever assembled, being impossible, owing to the necessity of my remaining here to oppose the criminal code bill, which re-enacts personally the worst provisions of the coercion act, and if passed, will leave constitutional movements at the mercy of the government, I would respectfully ask you to lay my views before the convention. I would respectfully advise that your platform should be so framed as to enable us to continue to accept help from America, and at the same time avoid affording a pretext to the British government for entirely suppressing the national movement in Ireland. In this way only, can unity of movement be preserved, both in Ireland and America. I have perfect confidence that by prudence, moderation and firmness the cause of Ireland will continue to advance, and though persecution rests heavily upon us at present, before many years have passed we shall have achieved those great objects for which through many centuries, our race has struggled. CHAS. STEWART PARNELL.

The committee on merging the old with the new organization not being ready to report, the day was mostly spent in discussing minor matters. Of the result he has still perfect confidence. The speeches made were in the interest of harmony and united national action.

Friday was the last and most important day of the session. In the afternoon the committee on resolutions reported a very lenthy series, constituting a very minute and terrible arraignment of England for her course towards Ireland and concluding with a declaration of principles, among which and the most important were the following: Resolved, By the Irish-American people in convention assembled, that the English government in Ireland, originating in usurpation and perpetuated by force, having failed to discharge any of the duties of government, and never having acquired the consent of the governed, has no moral right whatever to exist in Ireland, and that it is the duty of the Irish race throughout the world to sustain the Irish people in the employment of all legitimate means to substitute for it national self-government.

Resolved, That we pledge our unqualified support, moral and material, to our countrymen in Ireland in their efforts to recover national self-government, and in order more effectually to promote this object by the consolidation of all our resources, and the creation of one responsible and representative body to speak for the greater Ireland in America, that all societies represented in this convention, and that all may hereafter comply with the conditions of admission, be organized into an Irish National League of America, for the purpose of supporting the National League of Ireland, of which Charles Stewart Parnell is president.

Resolved, That the policy of the English government in first reducing the Irish peasantry to abject poverty, and then sending them penniless to the United States, dependent upon American charity, is unnatural, inhuman and an outrage upon the American government and people.

The resolutions were adopted. The report of the committee on organization was then read as follows:

Whereas, In the opinion of citizens of America and Canada, Irish, and Irish descent, it is needful for purposes hereinafter set forth, that, sinking all private prejudice and creed distinctions, they do unite to secure this common end, do band themselves together under the name, and title of the Irish National League of America.

Article 1—The objects of the Irish National League of America are:

First—Earnestly and actively to sustain the Irish National League in Ireland in its moral and material aid in achieving self-government in Ireland.

Second—To procure a clear and more accurate understanding by the American people of the political, industrial and social condition of Ireland, that they may see for themselves that her poverty is the result of centuries of brute force and destructive legislation, and that if permitted to make her own laws on her own soil, she will demonstrate possession of all essentials, natural and ideal, for the political autonomy, beneficial alike to Ireland and the United States.

Third—To promote development of Irish manufacturers by encouraging their import into the United States; to promote the study of Irish history, past and present, and circulate carefully prepared literature in schools and societies, that the justice of the cause may be thoroughly defended against ignorance, malice, and misrepresentation.

Fourth—To encourage the study of the Irish language, cultivation of Irish music and enlightened love of art, characteristics which have made the past of our race bright amid darkness and have always secured for the Celt success and renown in every country in which he has had equal opportunity with his fellows.

Fifth—To hurt the enemy where he will feel it most by refusing to purchase any article of English manufacture, and by using all legitimate influence to discourage tradesmen from keeping English manufactures on sale.

Sixth—To abolish sectional feeling to destroy those baneful animosities of province and creed which have been handed down by the enemy, to weave closer the bonds of racial pride and affection, and to keep alive the holy flame of Irish nationality, while performing faithfully the duties of American citizenship.

After a stormy debate the plan of organization was adopted. It was ordered that a resolution of confidence and cheer be cabled to Charles S. Parnell. Mrs. Parnell, being introduced, said: Ladies and Gentlemen: I have been asked to crown with a wreath of laurel our immortal statesman, legislator and president, George Washington. The position of Ireland to-day is almost similar to that of our country in the Revolutionary war, and I have inherited a drop of that old blood. I have also inherited Irish blood, which gives me an additional claim on you. My father said, and I sustain him, that the party which secures and maintains a position in the enemy's country is sure to come out ahead. I deny that my son has not secured that position.

Mrs. Parnell then placed a wreath of laurel on the bust of George Washington, amid great enthusiasm, the banner of Ireland, being waved over her head at this time. Alexander Sullivan of Chicago was elected president, and Dr. Charles O'Reilly of Detroit treasurer of the new league and Maj. Byrne was elected vice president and John J. Hynes was chosen secretary.

The chairman announced that Mrs. Parnell had been elected president of the Ladies' National League of America. He called on Henry F. Sheridan of Chicago, to lead in singing "God Save Ireland." The song was sung, the convention rising and joining in the chorus. The chairman then declared the convention adjourned.

Following is the executive council of the national league.

Rev. Father McKenna of Massachusetts, W. B. Wallace of New York James Reynolds of New Hampshire, M. V. Gannon of Iowa, Judge J. G. Donnelly of Wisconsin, John L. Armstrong of Georgia, and United States Senator Jame Fair of Nevada.

Alexander Sullivan, elected president by the convention of the national league, is thirty-five years of age, and was born in Maine, He stumped Michigan for the constitutional amendment giving negroes the right of suffrage, and was an active abolitionist. He was a republican until 1872, then being a strong friend of Greeley, he supported the liberal movement, and has since been a democrat. He studied law with A. S. Sullivan of New York, and has been for a number of years in successful practice in Chicago.

Marriage of Infant Kentuckians.

There was an extraordinary wedding near South Covington, Ky., on Tuesday evening, when George F. Kyle, age fourteen, was married to Lizzie May Hollingshead, age thirteen, at the house of the groom's parents. The bride is an orphan and in order to obtain a license the groom's father qualified as her guardian. This is not a shrewd device to obtain a fortune, for all the parties concerned are comparatively poor, and nobody seems to know the reason for such a premature alliance. "The bride," says the Cincinnati Enquirer, "is not a voluptuous-looking girl, and, in fact, resembles a child that had not passed the spanking age, and the groom was not much her superior in this respect. The bride was modestly and neatly attired, and resembled a little girl that was dressing for her first attendance to a children's party. There was none of that style of love that is generally displayed at a wedding; and when the minister pronounced them man and wife they faced each other for a moment and suddenly the childish groom embraced his diminutive bride. It was a rather strange sight, and looked more like a children's mock marriage than a solemn reality."

Gresham Knew His Own Business.

Here is a story illustrating the new postmaster General's independence: He is greatly admired by Judge Drummond, of the United States Circuit Court, and they have been oftener on the bench together than custom or necessity requires, Drummond going out of his way to invite Gresham to sit with him—One day when an important case was called the District Attorney announced that it would be withdrawn from the docket.—"By whose authority?" asked Judge Gresham. "By instructions from Washington," was the reply.—"But whose instructions?" The rejoiner was, if not evasive, unsatisfactory. "We do not recognize the right of anybody at Washington, even the president himself," said Judge Gresham, "to interfere whether by instructions or requests in the trial of a cause before this court. Proceed with the trial of the case." The trial was proceeded and a conviction was secured. This story, current in the papers several years ago, was recalled to me by our postmaster General Huidekoper, who is an old an intimate friend of Gresham's.

A Worker of Miracles.

A worker of miracles has appeared in Brooklyn—Dr. F. Monck—who professes to cure diseases by prayer and laying on of hands. He is a long-haired Englishman, bearded and mustached, and made up for mysterious effect. Last Sunday he got three thousand people into the Brooklyn Academy of Music and told them of cures he had made of paralysis, rheumatism, fevers, cross-eyes, &c., and all the while a collection was taken up. He then invited those who were sick and afflicted in the audience to come forward, and half a hundred came. They were apparently cured by the manipulations of the doctor, and seemed to rejoice. But the audience only laughed at the proceedings. If the age of miracles is not past most of the believers in the miracle-worker are dead.

A young man writes: "Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla cured me of nervous debility, weak urinary organs, disturbing dreams, etc., after I had tried a dozen doctors. I think the fact that it is a sure cure for nervous debility should be generally known. It may save many useful lives."

Lord Palmerston being asked when a man was in the "prime of life," immediately answered "73."

Henry Ward Beecher expresses the opinion that the world is revolving toward perfection.

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll is at work on a lecture on Shakespeare.

NUMBER FIFTEEN.

I always begin at the beginning when I write a story. Some authors like to commence a story in the middle and work at both ends; but that isn't my way, or, rather it wouldn't be my way if I was in the habit of writing stories, which, thank Heaven, I am not. I get my living in a respectable way, by the sweat of my brow, not by writing lies for newspapers. Consequently I've but one story to write, and that is my own.

My name is Roderick McStivers, and I'm a native of the good old town of Tadmouth; I'm forty years old if I'm a day, and, if I do say it, as good looking for my age as any man you ever set eyes on. Twenty years ago I was fully as handsome as I am now, and at that time I was engaged to the charming Mary Black, the belle of Tadmouth. That was the beginning of all my woe—that engagement. I was poor then (I own the largest boot manufactory in Tadmouth to-day), and the Lord only knew when I should be able to marry Mary. But she said she didn't care, she could wait two or three centuries just as well as not, if I'd only be true to her meantime.—

Sooner shall the blue ocean melt to air,
 Sooner shall earth resolve itself to sea,
Than I resign thine image, oh my fair!
 Or think of anything excepting thee.

That's just what I said. You wouldn't think, to look at me now, that I could say anything quite so soft as the above, would you, eh? Bless you! I had more poetry in my head twenty years ago than you could shake a stick at.

Many are poets who have never penn'd
 Their inspirations, and perchance the best.

That's what's the trouble with me. If I hadn't confined myself to leather, I should have played the deuce with "the nine." Well, you understand from the above that Mary and I were all right. I swore that I'd be true, and she dittoed; but, bless me, my dear sir, the sweet girl had a father, and he was not so young as we were by several years.

"Those were days when my heart was volcanic," but the old gentleman's palpitator was as hard and cold as a cast-iron grindstone. The paternal Black did not believe much in love, you see.

He had married for money, and, in his opinion, that was the only thing worth marrying for; and so, instead of throwing his only child away upon a miserable vagabond like myself, he very unceremoniously showed me the door one evening, and the very next day brought a lover of his own choosing home to Mary. The lover's name was Bunsby, and he rolled in gold, metaphorically speaking; owned a fine house in New York, and had horses, carriages and servants "too numerous to mention." Oh, why should I linger over this period of my existence I'm sure I don't know why, and hang me if I do.

You guess the rest. Mary was dazzled with her new lover's wealth. She forgot poor Roderick McStivers, and married Thos. Bunsby, Esq., and I—I, alas, was not invited to the wedding! Anything more heartless than the above can scarcely be imagined, I suppose I might have "gone into mourning." They told me I couldn't be a nun on account of my sex.

"Oh, what shall I do?" I asked, in a voice that sounded horribly strange, notwithstanding that it was my own. I defy you to tell me what I did do. In the light of my twenty years' experience I am convinced that I did the best thing I could under the circumstances. I married my boarding mistress. She was 35 and I was 20 years of age; she was—

A maid unmatched in manners as in face,
Skilled in each art, and crowned with every grace.

And, though I never learned to love her extravagantly, I must confess that she could make the best apple dumplings that I ever ate. In the course of time I became a father. A daughter was born to us, and we called her Julia, after my grandmother, who was the most beautiful woman in the country, to judge of her portrait now before me. My daughter looks much as my grandmother did at her age. Well, as I said, a daughter was born to us and a son was born to Bunsby, and they called him Tom. We heard of the last-mentioned event up here in Tadmouth, but for years I never saw either Mary or her son, notwithstanding they used to visit her father quite often while the old gentleman lived. But at last, Mr. Black was gathered to his fathers, and about the same time my wife was gathered to her mothers, and I was left alone with my little Julia. I was rich then—the most wealthy man in Tadmouth—and I had built me a fine house, the same that I have lived in ever since, with my little Julia as housekeeper. Well, how things will come about! Last summer young Tom Bunsby came out to Tadmouth and put up at the hotel—they have quite a number of summer boarders there—and the first thing the young man did was to fall in love with my daughter Julia. Of course the poor fellow was not to blame. He couldn't help it, for she was the most bewitching little woman that you ever saw, not withstanding that old McStivers is her father.

He saw her first at a picnic, danced with her, kissed her in the ring, and walked home with her at night. I remember the evening very well. I was sitting in my library smoking a cigar and thinking of the late Mrs. McStivers—oh, those apple dumplings! my mouth waters every time I think o. them—when, the windows being open, I heard voices at the door. I knew it was Julia, and I knew she had a young fellow with her, and, tear my wig, if he wasn't begging for a kiss.

How silvery sweet sound lovers' tongues by night,
Like softest music to attending ears.

I remarked earnestly to Mr. McStivers. In about five minutes Julia came in blushing like a ten-acre flower garden, and looking as lovely as a fairy queen.

"Oh, papa! I've had such a splendid time!" said she, throwing herself into my arms and kissing the cuticle off my right cheek.

"Yes, I should think so, particularly during the last five minutes," I remarked.

"Oh, father!" and she hid her face in my whiskers.

"Who was it, my dear?" I inquired.

"Mr. Thomas Bunsby.

"Tom Bunsby!" I yelled, springing to my feet, while me eyes rolled fearfully. Oh, it was a terrible sight, I know, because there was a mirror in front of me.

"Ha!"

Nothing that you ever heard on the stage ever equalled that blood-curdling "Ha!" of mine.

My daughter fell at my feet the picture of terrified terror or horrified horror, I can't tell which. The whole thing was grand and awful in the extreme.

"Girl," said I, in a voice of thunder and lightning, "did you know Tom Bunsby's father?"

"No-o."

"Or his mother?"

"No.

"Or his grandfather?"

"No."

"I'm sorry," said I, making a terrible effort to calm myself. "I'm very sorry because the rascal's own grandfather, my old friend, the old gentleman kicked me out of his front door for daring to make love to his daughter, and, by [illegible] Tom Bunsby comes here [illegible] serve him in the same man[illegible] venge is sweet—'tis sweet."

Julia got up then.

"Can I go now, father?" she asked.

"Yes; but, remember, no more of Tom Bunsby. Good-night." * * *

Time passed on and Julia seemed the same as usual. Whether she saw Tom or not I did not know at the time, though I have since learned that they were in the habit of meeting quite frequently. No, I did not know that they met but I suspected that they might, and, to prevent any chance of an elopement, I never allowed Julia to go out in the evenings unless I went with her, and at 10 o'clock every night the doors and windows were all made fast against burglars and lovers, and we slept secure until morning. You perceive by this that I am not one of those who wait until the mare is stolen before locking the stable. Well, it was one night about a month ago, that, after locking up the house as usual, I retired to my room, and, disrobing this lovely form of mine, crept into bed. I had just finished my first nap, and turned over for the second, when the door bell rang. And how did it ring! Egad! I thought they would pull it down. Was it fire, burglars, or did somebody mistake my house for the doctor's? I didn't stop to think, but, throwing on my clothes in the shortest possible time, I rushed down stairs and threw open the door, holding my revolver straight before me as I did so.

"A note for you, sir," said a small boy, handing me a folded paper. My first thought was that it was a telegraph dispatch.

"Anything to pay?" I asked.

"No, sir," and the boy vanished in the thick darkness. Closing the door I tore open the note and read:

Mr. McStivers: Your daughter will elope to-night with Tom Bunsby, if she has not already. If you find her not in her room, run to the hotel—room 15, first flight.

Adieu. JOE KERR.

All the tiger in the McStiverses was aroused. I dashed madly up-stairs, and, throwing open Julia's door, rushed in. Alas! I was too late. She was gone—the bird had flown. She had not been in bed that night. I did not continue the search there, but flew on the wings of the wind out of the room, out of the house along the street, till I reached the Tadmouth hotel. The clerk was dozing in the office, and did not see me when I entered. I did not speak but crept cautiously up-stairs and along the corridor until I reached No. 15.

"Death to Bunsby" I muttered through my clinched teeth.

Oh how ferocious I must have looked. My blood curdles even now while I think of it. I knocked at the door.

"I will call him out and shoot him in his tracks," said I. "I'm insane now. McFarland was nowhere compared with me, and no jury will convict me." But no one answered the knock, I tried the door. Ha, it was unlocked. I entered the room. The above four words are of terrible import, and I want you to consider them well. The gas was burning, but all was still, save the soft breathing of a sleeper, whose face was hidden from me by the curtains of the bed. I sprang forward, tore open the curtains, seized a bare arm, and with the celerity of lightning, yanked the sleeper into sudden wakefulness. The ex-sleeper screamed, I yelled once, and then, with a musical groan, fell to the floor, tearing my hair as I went.

"Roderick!" said screamer.

"Oh, heavings where am I? Ma-Mary, is it thou? Where is—is Bunsby?"

"Dead."

"And you?"

"I'm a widow; and you?"

"I'm—I'm a widower," I answered, with a groan.

"I always loved you, Roderick," said she.

"And you are just as handsome as ever," said I.

"You've acted very improper to-night," said she.

"Infernally so," said I. "Where is your son?"

"I know not. He loves your daughter and she loves him—and I love you."

Mary blushed. (Considering that she was in a very light costume it wasn't strange that she should.)

"And Bunsby's dead?"

"Bunsby's dead!"

"Mary," said I, "may I be a second Bunsby—that is—oh—ah! will you be mine?"

She threw herself into my arms. Just then I heard footsteps; I turned and saw Tom and Julia standing at the door.

"The deuce!" cried Tom.

"No, no, it's my father!" said Julia. "Oh, father, won't you forgive us?"

There was a queer twinkle in her eyes when she said that.

"Forgive us for what?"

"For marrying Tom, I'll promise not to do it again."

"And will you forgive me for marrying his mother, as I mean to do to-morrow?"

"Oh, will you, pa?"

"I will if anybody'll tell me who wrote that note to me to-night," said I.

"I wrote it," replied Tom, with a laugh. "Julia was hid in the closet when you went to her room, and when you went out of the house she followed you, met me, the minister was waiting, and we were quickly made one flesh. But how came you in this room?"

"The note said I should find you here."

"Yes; I thought you would like to see my mother, though she didn't know you was coming. But how did you get in?"

"I forgot to lock the door," said Mary.

"How lucky," said I. "We'll have another wedding to-morrow. And now good night."

I kissed Mary and the dear children—bless them—and then, taking my hat returned to my home, a much happier man than I had been for years.

There was a wedding next day, a quiet affair, and then a short tour.

At present we are all at home—Tom, Julia, Mary and I—and if you don't believe my story just come down to Tadmouth and inquire. Everybody knows me here.

He Meant Well.

The St. Louis Republican tells of an amusing incident that occurred in a church of that city a couple of Sundays ago. A gentleman was the owner of a very unique pin in the shape of a large black spider, the body of which is a large amethyst. This ornament was presented to a young lady friend and she wore it on her dress to service. It so happened, and unfortunately, that a young gentleman near her perceived the lifelike ornament on the young lady's dress, and to all appearances crawling up to her face. A look of terror overspread his features, and without any hesitation he endeavored to brush off what to him appeared a tarantula. He missed it and brushed at it again, when the almost audible smiles of a few who witnessed the gentleman's heroic endeavors attracted the young lady's attention. He became very red in the face when he discovered his mistake, and it will be a long time before he attends that church again.

Visiting a Sad Scene.

On one evening of every week a neatly dressed woman visits the stage entrance of Haverly's Theatre, in Brooklyn, N. Y. The main entrance of the Brooklyn Theatre, destroyed by fire on the night of Dec. 5, 1876, with nearly [illegible] par[illegible] [illegible]ber [illegible] down [illegible]ome. One of the [illegible] the station next do[illegible] early evening of tha[illegible] [illegible]en years and more ago th[illegible] of this woman asked her to accompany him to the play. She had been hard at work during the day and preferred to remain at home, but wished that he should visit the theatre. He did so and his body was among the unrecognized dead the following day. The wife fell and for a time it was feared she would lose her reason. Once a week at night, from the date of her recovery to the present, this poor woman has visited the spot.

Mr. and Mrs. Spoopendyke.

"Now, my dear," said Mrs. Spoopendyke, gathering up her skirts and making for the door; "now, my dear, we are already, aren't we? You take those pots of plants and I'll carry the cut flowers."

"How'm I to take thirteen pots of plants in two hands?" growled Mr. Spoopendyke, surveying his job, with dissatisfaction in his eye.

"What is there about me that seems to give you the impression that I am a freight train? What dy'e call these things, anyway? What's this ghost standing up here with a candle in his hand? What particular interest has he got in the Easter business? How'm I going to carry these things? That's what I want to know.

"That's a calla lily, dear," replied Mrs. Spoopendyke, laying down her flowers and turning to help her husband. "Now, you can take these pots in your arms by letting the edge of one pot rest on the edge of another. Let me show you," and Mrs. Spoopendyke arranged the pots, neatly folded in clean white paper, in her husband's arms. "That's the way to carry them," she chirped, opening the door for him. "Now, you are all right!"

"Expect me to put on my hat with my leg, don't you?" inquired Mr. Spoopendyke, trying to reach around so that he might see out from his burden. "P'raps you think I don't need any decoration while I am carrying these dod gasted shrubs! May be you think I'd present a more tropical appearance without any hat!"

"I'll put on your hat dear," fluttered Mrs. Spoopendyke, and she carefully put it on hind side before and flattened it down until the "back breadth," as she called it, rested on his shoulders. "Now you're all right, dear, be careful of the flowers!"

Mr. Spoopendyke followed his wife to the street and gave the burden a sort of hitch to relieve himself.

"Here! Look here!" he cried to his wife, "you don't load me straight! These things are slipping! Fix 'em, can't ye?"

"We haven't far to go," pleaded Mrs. Spoopendyke, who couldn't see that anything was wrong. "Can't you hold them, dear, till we get to church?"

"Oh, I can't hold 'em!" squealed Mr. Spoopendyke, "Get out of my eye! can't ye take this yaller lily out of my eye? Look out for my hat! Don't you see it's slipping off? If you don't make some better arrangement about these things the neighbors will be startled by the sound of cracking crockery!"

"I hope you won't break any of them," sighed Mrs. Spoopendyke. Then she pulled his hat over his eyes and took him by the elbow to lead him along.

"Look out!" yelled Mr. Spoopendyke, as he felt a pot going. "Here's a decoration in danger! Catch it, if ye don't want to lose a big slice of this resurrection! Catch it, quick!"

But Mrs. Spoopendyke was too late. The pot dropped with a crash on Mr. Spoopendyke's instep and rolled into the gutter.

"Oh, dear!" moaned Mrs. Spoopendyke.

"There you are!" roared Mr. Spoopendyke, hopping with pain and dropping another pot. "Satisfied now? Know anyone you want to back me against for a Garden of Eden? Got any more horticultural societies you want knocked out? Here goes another!" and the third of the series smashed on the sidewalk.

"A charge I have to keep," and down came the largest pot of the lot with a prodigious noise.

"Don't!" squealed Mrs. Spoopendyke, watching the fate of her decorations with dismay.

"I ain't!" yelled Mr. Sooopendyke, letting go two more in the effort to keep his hat on. "Who is? Get hold of that off representative of the day we celebrate," and Mr. Spoopendyke clutched wildly at a sliding pot, not that he cared for the flower particularly, but he had felt four drops on his foot, and he felt some fears. "Dod gast the pot," he squawked, as it eluded him, and landed on his best corn.

"I think you're real mean!" sobbed Mrs. Spoopendyke, surveying the wreck with streaming eyes.

"You do, do you?" howled Mr. Spoopendyke, who felt as badly as his wife did now that it was all over. "P'raps you had some kind of a notion that those pots would fall when I let go of em! Why didn't you put 'em in a bag so a man could carry 'em without spilling em? What do you want of decorations, anyway?"

"Because to-morrow's Easter, and I wanted to help make the church pretty," and with this explanation Mrs. Spoopendyke broke down completely and wept bitterly.

"Well, ain't it just as much Easter out doors as it is in the church?" demanded Mr. Spoopendyke, "And haven't you decorated as much as any woman? What'd you expect? Think people are going to take you for a cathedral just because you take a few shrubs to church once a year? Now you go in the house and don't let me hear any more whimpering. With your notions about duty and your desire to get the best of the other women in the church, you only want a bell in your mouth and a black collar be a whole guild!"

And with this benediction Mr. Spoopendyke started off to see Specklewottle and make some arrangement with him for going fishing as soon as the trout ponds should show signs of breaking up.

The Doctor's Endorsement.

Dr. W. D. Wright, Cincinnati, O., sends the sub-joined professional endorsement: "I have prescribed Dr. William Hall's Balsam for the Lungs in a great number of cases and always with success. One case in particular was given up by several physicians who had been called in for consultation with myself. The patient had all the symptoms of confirmed consumption—cold night sweats, hectic fever, harassing cough, etc. He commenced immediately to get better and was soon restored to his usual health. I have also found Dr. Wm. Hall's Balsam for the Lungs the most valuable expectorant for breaking up distressing coughs and colds that I have ever used."

LABOUCHERE'S LAST.

The Platform of the "Coming Democracy" in England.

G. W. Smalley's London Letter.

Mr. Labouchere contributes to the March Fortnightly an article entitled "A Democrat on the Coming Democracy," which students of English politics cannot afford to neglect. Mr. Labouchere, it is true, is not a recognized exponent of Radicalism, but he is a singularly frank person, and his views may be taken as shared by a few of his colleagues in the house, some of whom are less able and all less outspoken. His sympathy with Mr. Chamberlain, for example, is close, and he looks to Mr. Chamberlain as a leader. Mr. Labouchere's programme would startle most of the reasonable politicians who call themselves Liberal; not less from the way in which it is urged than from its extent. The earlier items will not strike you in America as subversive of society, revolutionary though they are. Equal electoral districts, payment of election expenses and of members by the state, biennial parliaments, abolition of the house of Lords as a legislative body—these, preceded by the adoption of an extended franchise, are the immediate objects Mr. Labouchere proposes to himself. They are, however, only preliminary—only a pulling of the political machine into rapid working order. With the lords out of his way and a democratic house of commons Mr. Labouchere would proceed to abolish the civil list and put the queen (whom he permits to remain on the throne as ornamental figure-head) on a salary of $50,000 a year, like the president of the United States. He would disestablish and disendow the church of England "at once," and devote the $15,000,000 a year to be got from its revenues to educational purposes. He would settle the land question by making occupiers owners. He would limit the number of acres a man may own, and of pounds sterling he may accumulate. Taxation would be based on the "excellent principle" that those ought to pay who can best afford it. Customs and excise are to be abolished, and the burdens now laid on "industry" to be sustained by help of a progressive income tax and progressive succession duty—rising to 50 per cent. And so on and so on. These may do for samples.

Mr. Labouchere does not expect help from the moderate liberals in this work. He proposes to reconstruct the parties by turning out the whigs, and calculates that when he and his friends have superseded them, the bulk of the organization, "who are mere waiters on providence," will cheerfully follow the new lead. The whigs are the fons et origo of all evil. They accept the part of "traitors" in the liberal camp for the sake of office and profit. Whigs, conservatives and moderate liberals are, indeed, actuated by the paltry ambition of appending Right Honorable to their names, and by lust of mere spoils. Heretofore Right Honorable has been thought to be not an appendix but a prefix. "We," on the contrary, we virtuous but slightly Pharisaical radicals, "we look steadil to the triumph of our principles." Mr. Labouchere is a very clever man, but there is an old saying, no fool like a clever fool. I beg Mr. Labouchere's pardon for quoting it, and I use the word in a purely political and parliamentary sense. But if he believes Englishmen are going to accept either his account of his opponents, or his programme, he has access to some very secret and peculiar sources of information. Probably he believes neither.

A Brave Deed; or, Cheated of its Prey.

BY MRS. M. E. BRADDON.

"Somebody must go for the doctor."

It was Reine de Fac who spoke, and her words fell ominously on that little band of watchers. One of their number must brave the violence of the storm; a human life was at stake. There was silence for a moment; then Mark Maston said, in a low, firm voice, "I will go."

Reine heard him, and turned deadly pale, but no sound of emotion passed her lips, and no one noticed her pallor in the growing dusk. A minute passed, the door slammed, and Mark was gone.

There were two roads to Paxton, where the doctor lived, the highway and the beach. The distance was shorter by the beach, but the way more perilous; for at flood-tide the waves lashed high the cliffs which shut off retreat inland.

It took Mark Maston but an instant to decide his course; every moment was precious, and he must try the beach. He glanced along the shore; the water was about twenty feet from the cliffs, which presented their rugged front to the whistling eastern blast. Thinking only of the loved one at home, he dashed along.

Two miles before him a headland projected into the sea. If this was passed Mark Maston was safe. On he sped. The gale caught the spray of the breakers, and whirled it against the cliffs, drenching the bold messenger to the skin.

At last the headland came in sight. Mark stopped, and shading his eyes, gazed fixedly ahead. A shudder shook his frame. While he looked, a mighty billow came rushing in from the sea, and dashed high on that projecting cliff.

Turn back, Mark Maston; turn back or you are doomed!

But no; with clenched teeth he ran on—on to certain death. But is it certain? Can he do it? Can he reach there in time?

Yes, gentle reader. I think he can, if he plods right along. It is only half a mile, and he has got nine hours and a quarter to do it in. The tide is going out. Mark Maston is saved! The sea is "cheated of its prey!"—Harvard Lampoon.

Law Versus Gospel.

Law versus gospel: At the Chester, Eng., police court, a laborer named Thomas Moran was summoned for neglecting to contribute to the support of his children in the workhouse. The relieving officer said the defendant's six children were admitted to the poorhouse in September. Moran agreeing to pay ten shillings weekly to their support. Up to the present time he had only paid fourteen shillings. His wife was in an asylum. Moran said that a fortnight after the children entered the house he was laid up ten weeks from an accident. When he got better, frost set in, and he got no work for thirteen weeks. After that, he got five days' work weekly, and when in full work his wages were but a pound a week. The long illness made a debt that had to be paid, and he had paid the guardians all he could. An entry in the police book showed that Moran was carried to the infirmary on a stretcher, in September. Notwithstanding this, the magistrates sentenced the "prisoner" to a month's hard labor. The defendant burst out crying, exclaiming: "For God's sake, gentleman, give me a chance. I was never in prison. If you send me I'll lose my work. If you give me time, I'll pay all." He was removed, still appealing for mercy.

HEREDITY.

A soldier of the Cromwell stamp,
  With sword and prayer-book at his side,
At home alike in church and camp;
  Austere he lived, and smileless died.
But she, a creature soft and fine—
  From Spain some say, some say from France;
Within her veins leap blood like wine—
  She led her Roundhead lord a dance!
In Grantham church they lie asleep;
  Just where, the verger may not know.
Strange that two hundred years should keep
  The old ancestral fires aglow.
In me these two have met again;
  To each my nature owns a part;
To one, the cool and reasoning brain;
  To one, the quick, unreasoning heart.

MARGARET.

It was in the summer of 1870 that I first met Margaret, in a small Western town where I went to nurse a sick friend. The nearest railroad station was twelve miles away, and the letter which I had sent in advance having miscarried, there was no one at the station to meet me.

It was late at night, but availing myself of a waiting coach that carried passengers to and fro, I arrived, after what seemed an interminably long drive, at a large house that was dimly outlined against the sky.

There was a general look of forlorness about the place, as though things were going to ruin; and owing to the lateness of the hour, we had some difficulty in effecting an entrance; but my coachman at length made himself heard, and a window-sash having been thrown up, a childish voice called out, imperiously, "Stop your racket! I'm coming."

The door was almost immediately unlocked and partly opened; a small head thrust out.

"Is that you, Sam Barnes? Has anything happened to pa?" was eagerly demanded.

"Dunno nothin' 'bout yer pa. This here lady is come to stay," returned Sam, indicating me with a wave of the hand, and shouldering my trunk.

"Oh! that's it, is it?" said the child, in a relieved tone. And then, turning to me with a kind of pert embarrassment, and throwing the door wide open, she said,—

"Well, if you have come to stay, perhaps you had better walk in."

I complied with this oddly-worded invitation and walked into a wide, dark hall, lit by a tallow candle, which sputtered dismally in a tin candle-stick on the one table.

I paid and dismissed Sam, and found myself alone with an odd young person, who had crossed her hands behind her and was leaning against the wall, staring at me with the utmost sang-froid.

There was no suggestion of youth about her, except in her small, slight figure and a certain immaturity about the thin, sharp features.

She might have been thirteen or thirty, so impossible was it to decide upon the bundle of contradiction presented by her dress, manner and physique. I heard later that she was eleven.

She wore ill-fitting, clumsily-made clothes, but her brows were straight and well-marked, and she had a pair of large, extraordinarily intelligent eyes, that looked all the larger for the bluish circles under them.

But it was the worn, anxious lines in the child's face that most attracted my attention. I was struck, too, by her manner, which had a certain mixture of composure and restlessness, of frankness and reserve.

"I am Miss Jeanret's friend, and have come to take care of her," I said, in explanation. "How is she?"

"Better, I fixed her poultice this afternoon, and she has been asleep nearly ever since. You can see her in the morning; she'll be precious glad you've come."

"You fixed her poultice!" I exclaimed. "Why, where was—everybody?" I concluded, lamely, unable to particularize.

"Oh, Aunt Stubbs is most as blind as a bat, and ma ain't good for anything where there are sick people. Ma is nervous, and she always cries and drops things. I am glad I happened to hear you at the door. It is too bad you were kept waitin'. You look awful tired. I was dreamin, and heard the knockin', but I thought it was pa makin' a coffin for the baby."

"I am afraid I frightened you," I said. "You seemed to think something dreadful had happened to your father. I wrote your aunt that I was coming, and thought she would be expecting me; but I suppose she didn't get the letter."

"No, it didn't come that I know. Did you put it in a yellow envelope?"

"I don't remember," I answered, surprised at the inquiry. "I don't think I did."

"She always burns those without reading them. Bills, you know. Pa is out late to-night he is making up his books."

"And you are sitting up for him, like a good daughter," I naturally answered.

She darted an angry glance at me and colored.

"I ain't doing anything of the sort," said she, sharply. "I had to be up and down with the baby, and I thought I might as well stay dressed."

Surprised at having annoyed her, I said, "What baby? Whose baby? Not yours, surely."

"My little brother. Such a dear! Now, let me see; where will I put you to sleep!"

"I won't wake Aunt Stubbs up; it's no use," she went on reflectively. "Oh! I know; you can go in Miss Waring's room. She is away. She is awful fussy. She'd have a fit if she knew you had her room. I'll go get the key."

With that she ran upstairs, but came back almost instantly, and gathering up an armful of my wraps and parcels, she led the way into a large, bare, dismal bedroom on the first floor.

"Nice, isn't it?" said the child lighting the candle and looking around with an air of pride. "It is the best room, and all the things belong to Aunt Stubbs, only Miss Waring pays regular, and so she has them. If you have got all you want, I am off."

"I shall do very well now, thank you. but won't you tell me your name before you go?"

Her hand was on the door-knob as I spoke.

"Margaret," said she, and went out; but she opened the door again immediately, and added, "Rea," and without waiting for another nodded twice in a jerky, ungraceful fashion, and disappeared.

Tired out by my day's experience, I at once undressed and went to bed, but alas! not to sleep. After tossing and tumbling about restlessly for two or three hours, I determined to try what a sedative could do for me, although I rarely resorted to anything of the kind. The bottle was in my large bag, and the bag I found had been left in the hall.

I opened the door softly and looked out, and there, sitting on a chair with her head resting on the table, sound asleep, was my new acquaintance!

The poor child had rolled up her apron as a substitute for a pillow, and made a footstool of my bag. She looked much younger than she had done awake, but her expression was even sadder, and her whole attitude one of profound weariness.

I was about to rouse her when I heard steps on the veranda outside, and some one fumbled at the lock.

I understood then why Margaret had gone to bed, and why she had been vexed with me f[illegible] was waiting up [illegible]

I retreated. A[illegible]ed. "Margaret!" an[illegible]hild started to her fe[illegible]oor and admitted a tall ma[illegible]aressed and too evidently intoxicated.

"What the dickens do you mean by keeping your old father waiting?" he demanded, angrily.

"Hush, pa!" she answered. Don't make a noise. I was asleep and I didn't hear you. Sit down there, now, and let me take off your shoes," half-guiding him to the chair she had vacated, she gave him a little push that sent him into it safely, though rather askew, and kneeling down, she rapidly divested him of a pair of dusty brogans.

"Thank you, my dear child, thank you. You are the handsomest of all my children, Margaret, much the handsomest, and you have always been my favorite," remarked the father, with vinous impressiveness, attempting to embrace her as she rose to her feet.

"Yes, pa, I know I am a beauty; but hadn't you better come up stairs?" said she, avoiding his arm, but giving him a kiss of her own accord on the forehead.

"Make me a bed here, my dear. I don't care where I sleep, and I can't bear to give trouble," suggested Mr. Rea.

"Pooh, pa! don't be ridiculous. I can't do that. Come along!" and with this, Margaret helped him up and propelled him toward the stairs.

"Take care, pa, you'll fall!" she cried, as he tripped on the first step, and together they slowly mounted to the floor above.

Their footsteps died away; I made a second and more successful attempt to get my bag, took my medicine, and after thinking over the little scene I had just witnessed, dropped into a sleep that lasted well toward noon of the following day.

Margaret awoke me, by bringing in my breakfast, and sat down near me while I ate it.

"I am surprised to find how late it is," I said. "What have you been doing this morning, Margaret?"

"Well, I [illegible] the baby's gums, an dressed the children and gave them their breakfast, and then I went to the butcher's for Aunt Stubbs, and came home and put the feather's in ma's bonnet, and sewed the buttons on pa's coat, and gave Miss Jeanret her pills, and then I made your chocolate, and brought your breakfast."

"And how is my friend?" I asked, unable to restrain a laugh at the gravity with which she rattled off this extraordinary list of occupations.

"She says it 'most cures her to hear that you've come, and she sends her love. Have you known her long?"

"Yes," I said, "she was my governess years ago, and we have been friends ever since."

"Aunt Stubbs says she hopes you will get up early," Margaret continued, "because Miss Waring is coming back and will snort if she finds you in her room. But don't you hurry for that. The boarders are all dying to see you, and ma is going to put her best dress on for dinner."

I expressed as best I could my appreciation of this compliment.

"You haven't eaten your meat," she went on, presently. "Nobody ever eats it after the first day. Mr. Smith, one of the boarders, says he hopes it will be better now you've come. But it won't, you'll see. Aunt Stubbs never has any money, and the butcher says he can't stand it. I hate that man!"

I laughed again at this, and Margaret rose.

"I must go now," she said, and left the room.

As soon as I was dressed, I went to see my dear old governess, whom I found very weak, though convalescent. Her delight at seeing me knew no bounds.

"Ah," said she, "I have made no such friends since I am in America as your so kind family. And I have suffered, yes. But for a la petite, cette drole Marguerite, la niece de Madame Stubbs—you have seen?—I would now be not here. Elle a so much encouraged me par ses conseils, elle m'a soignee, as if I was' been her own mother. C'est une ange!"

I was soon established in a little room that opened into hers by Mrs. Stubbs in person. She was a frowzy, subdued-looking woman, with a wondering eye, and a chronically apologetic manner, and was dressed in brownish black mourning and a cap that was never straight during the six weeks it came under my notice.

She was of a reminiscent turn of mind, and as she had adored her late lord, J. C. B. Stubbs, she told me rather more about his brilliant talents, and striking appearance, and remarkable peculiarities than I cared to hear. But she was a good soul, and worked like a beaver, and sheltered her brother and his family under a roof, every shingle of which was mortgaged.

"John had fixed up the place splendidly," she once told me, "and when he was elected to the Legislature, he said to me, "Maria, we must have a door-plate," and he got it, and a week after it was screwed on, my poor John was taken out right past it and buried."

The first day, at dinner, I was introduced to Margaret's parents. Her mother was a peevish looking woman, with tremendous pretensions to gentility. Everything with her was either "genteel," or "ungenteel."

Her best dress was very bad, indeed. It was a cheap silk, most elaborately made, and surmounted by a dirty lace collar, fastened with a pin very nearly as large as the Stubbs door-plate and made of the same metal.

She had evidently once been pretty, and was determined to be so still, if rouging, and powdering, and frizzling, and furbelowing could accomplish that end.

When I spoke of having met Margaret, who was not present, she looked ill at ease, and spoke of her patronizingly as "a good child, but very plain," adding later that she was "like her pa's family," and, presumably, not "genteel" in consequence.

The father was gigantic in stature, and mild in manner, with a red nose, and brandy-and-watery eyes, that told his story to even the least observant looker-on.

He seemed pleased when I spoke of Margaret's kindness to my friend, and persistently passed me all the dishes he could reach, including one quite at the other end of the table: while Mr. Smith, the postmaster, a small, fierce-looking man who habitually helped himself to the best of everything, looked on with undisguised alarm and disapproval.

During the next few weeks, each day threw fresh light upon Margaret's character, only to bring out new beauties, fresh evidences of unselfishness and thoughtfulness, and noble devotion to duty; and patient endurance of evils that would have crushed any ordinary spirit, combined with a courage and steadfastness I have never seen equalled.

For one thing, she had the entire charge of the three younger children, for her mother was an utterly helpless, thriftless creature, who did nothing but amuse herself, and dress derself, and could never be brought to see that this was not the whole duty of woman.

No sooner had she breakfasted than she put on her bonnet and started off to pay visits in the village.

Where she went and whether she was welcome or unwelcome, I have no idea, but she frequently stayed out all day. When she came home at night she was generally cross and tired, and after taking her supper, she would pick up a novel to read, and set Margaret at work altering her dresses, according to her directions. Thes[illegible]esses were second-hand finery, sent her by a rich sister, and were continually remodelled in accordance with every caprice of fashion.

How often have I caught a glimpse of the poor child's pale face bending over some such piece of work, after a day in which she had been alternately cook, nursery-maid, house-maid, seamstress, laundress, and no one knows what besides!

Were beds to be made, Margaret made them; it was she who, with Aunt Stubbs' help did the children's sewing; was any one ill, Margaret nursed them; and as to the odd jobs, who can number them?

The poor little body and soul and heart and mind must have all been one great ache, sometimes—after a field-day, for instance, when she had been cruelly mortified by her father, and snubbed by her mother, and the weather was warm, and the children troublesome, and the work unusually heavy. But I never once heard a complaint from the brave spirit, and I never saw her break down but once.

About a month after my arrival, Margaret made the acquaintance of a grown girl, who took a fancy to her, and asked her to go to a picnic. Moved by some vagrant impulse, she had agreed to go.

"I'll take Bob and Tom with me, ma—they won't be any trouble—if you will take care of the baby," she said to her mother, and for a wonder that remarkable parent made no objection.

On the morning of the long-looked-for day Margaret came into my room to say good-by. She was dressed in a new print her hair was neatly braided, and she sported a straw hat Miss Waring had given her. As she stood there holding a small brother with each hand, she looked for once almost like other girls.

"Keep an eye on ma, please," she said, in a beseeching tone, "and don't let her give the baby a teaspoonful of paragoric without any water, as she did to Bob, here, and almost strangled him. She isn't used to taking care of children, you know. My dear baby never gives a bit of trouble, though, to anybody, he is so good!"

I promised to do as she wished, and she left the house. Three times during the day did I go over to Mrs. Rea's room, ostensibly to offer my services, but really to see what she was about.

She was looking very important and bustling around, the first time, with baby in her arms.

The second time she received me coldly. Baby was on a sofa near the fire, and she was reading. The interruption was evidently unwelcome.

On my third entrance I was surprised to find her gone, and the baby lying on the hearth, apparently badly burnt about the face, as I saw to my unspeakable horror when I picked it up.

Mrs. Rea afterward explained that the child was fast asleep, and she had stepped over to the rectory to get the pattern of a lovely mantilla she had admired in church the Sunday previous.

As for Margaret, when she was told the news, she gave one shriek and fainted dead away. As soon as she was able to sit up, she took the little thing to her room and there nursed it with frantic tenderness day and night, until it was quite well again.

Happily the injuries, though serious, were not as great as I at first had feared.

I did my best to atone for my share of what seemed an awful crime,—though I really was blamed by no one. And I grew more attached to Margaret every day, as I watched her devotion to the sick child,—a child herself, but as capable and thoughtful as though she had been a woman of forty.

I discovered, too, that she had a poetical and imaginative side to her character. She was passionately fond of reading, and had devoured the few books that had come in her way with the greatest eagerness.

By the time my sick friend had regained her health, and my summons home had come, I had so interested my family in Margaret, that my eldest brother offered to give her a good education. I laid the matter before her parents who were both delighted, but Margaret would not listen to it for a moment.

"Educate me!" she exclaimed, in amazement.

"Gracious mercy! You've done this!" turning to me a grateful face). "What a good man your brother must be! I'de like it of all things. It would be nice to learn about everything—but," and she hesitated,—"I suppose I couldn't take the baby and the boys?"

I shook my head and smiled. Her face fell, but presently she smiled in response.

"Well, when the children are big, and ma gets well, and Aunt Stubbs don't have to take boarders anymore, I'll get some books and study by myself."

I threw no cold water upon the millennial programme, but I wrote home about it, and the result was an arrangement that went into effect the following year. A servant was hired to attend to some of Margaret's many duties, and she spent part of every day at the best school in the village.

The morning I left the Stubbs mansion I found by my plate at breakfast a bunch of daisies tied with a coarse twine, and an untidy brown-paper package containing a battered blue and-gilt copy of Tom Hood's poems. This had been left at the house by some summer boarder, and had long been considered a gem of Margaret's collection. I carried away a blurred vision of a queer, pathetic little figure that will never leave me.

For some years after I wrote to the child at intervals, but got no response—polite correspondence being not much in her line. My brothers got occasional reports from her teacher, who spoke in high terms of his protege's intelligence and industry,—and then came a long period in which we heard nothing.

I was looking out of the window one morning last winter, when a carriage drove up and a lady got out, and rung the bell and was admitted. She no sooner saw me than she rushed forward, took both hands and kissed me.

This proceeding was eminently calculated to take my breath away, but judge of my surprise when I found that this stranger was Margaret grown up, grown younger, prettier, happier, than I ever could have believed possible! Margaret whom I only remembered as laying the cloth, cleaning the grates nursing, sewing sweeping, toiling, and moiling, now richly-clad, perfectly ladylike in voice and manner, happily married, and mistress of a beautiful home.

It was soon all explained. Will Brooks had come to Deerfield and boarded in the neighborhood. He had seen, and wonderful to say, learned to care for Margaret, and married her, and had taken not only her but hers, into his big house and heart.

The boys were all at school. Aunt Stubbs was dead. Perverse fates had made of "ma" a confirmed invalid just when a carriage in which endless visiting might have been done was placed at her disposal.

"Poor pa," had made a vow—and kept it.

She was going to New York to join Will, she said, and would stop to show him to us as she came back, and he knew all about us, and was as grateful as could be for all our kindness, and so on for two hours.

My brother was away from home, a fact which we both regretted.

It was delightful to see, off the stage, such poetical justice done, and a harvest of happiness as richly reaped as it had been richly deserved.

The following week I got a beautiful pearl ring from Tiffany's "with Margaret's love and gratitude" on the card accompanying it, and I know my brother was not ill-pleased by a letter he got at the same time, although he passed it to me across the table without a word.

THE CURE BY PRAYER.

Details of the Cure of the Rev. Frank Ward of Augusta, Me.

From the Augusta, Me. Journal, April 4.

Almost everybody in Augusta has heard of Elder Frank Ward, a minister of the Christian church, residing on the Togus road, a distance of two miles from the city. On the 25th of October last he cut a terrible gash in his left ankle while chopping wood, the axe entering the bones of the leg and severing several cords and arteries. As a result he was very low and a sufferer the entire winter. At times Mr. Ward would be irrational and his mind would be wandering. So weak was he that all winter long he sat up but two half hours, excepting to have his bed made. Shortly before the healing his appetite failed him, and he slept but six hours during the past week. To make the case still worse neuralgia set in: Nearly everyone had given him over to die. On the 1st of March he had trouble around the heart and bad convulsions. On coming out of them Mr. Ward stated that he had received a dispatch from God which said that he should be healed on the 25th of March at 3 o'clock p. m. being just five months to a day and an hour from the time the cut was received; also, that at the same hour he should arise from his couch and walk from the same to the kitchen door, a distance of eight feet. He told his attendants to take the medicine away; that the Lord Jesus Christ had taken his case in hand, and it was for God's glory. Sunday, the 25th of March, came. He could only take half a teaspoonful of water at a time; his extremities were cold. About 3.30 o'clock, p m. people began to gather, until 28 were present. Shortly before 4 o'clock Elder Ward requested several of the brothers to put on his clothing, which was done. Then the hymn, "The Great Physician now is near," was sung, and the eighteenth chapter of First Kings, commencing with the twenty-first verse, was read. Following this, Friends minister Phebe Wadsworth, of this city, offered prayer, also Mrs. Stewart. On his request he was raised from his reclining position by brothers present. Before leaving his bed his breath became natural, and he became perfectly calm. Then, at precisely four o'clock, Mr. Ward arose from his bed, stood up, the first time for five months, and walked to the door but very little lame. Here, he says, the Lord told him to walk back to the bed. Again, at the same command, he walked to the door and back again. On returning the last time he took hold of one corner of the bed and lifted it bodily from the floor, so that a caster dropped out. Then sitting down on his couch the heretofore bedridden man shouted "Glory to God!" again and again—a little remarkable from the fact that he had not spoken above a whisper for two months and a half. At supper time our friend walked to the table, sat down and ate a hearty meal, and in the evening sang a hymn. At night he lay down to slumber, and slept perfectly sound all night long, the first natural sleep for five months. In the morning Mr. Ward arose, dressed himself, went to the door and shouted praises to God, so that the neighbors were aroused across the street. Since March 25, the day of the miraculous healing, the Elder has been up and walking about seemingly as smart as ever, and repeatedly offering thanks to God.

The Old Way and the New.

From the Springfield Republican.

There is a sermon to be picked out of the failure of Williston, Knight & Co., which was caused by the embezzlement of H. Williston Knight, a son of ex-Lieut. Gov. H. G. Knight, who has fled to Europe, carrying with him possibly $100,000 of the firm's money. This was the oldest and largest button making firm in the county, successors to the late Samuel Williston of Easthampton and honorable memory, who gave away a million dollars to various causes during his lifetime, and left nearly as much more to the seminary which bears his name and to Amherst College. From the small beginning of his wife's handiwork, and the employing of women in the neighborhood to cover buttons, up to the invention of special machinery and the building of factories, the employment of many people and the exercise of a liberal public spirit; through these steps the late Mr. Williston won his way to fortune and public esteem by careful methods and austere fidelity. He was the embodiment of honest New England thrift, and in the disposition of his wealth he was still a conscientious steward, true always to honor and the higher ideals.

The business which gave Samuel Williston his start in life and from which the bulk of his property was accumulated, has lived after him until now serious disaster has overtaken those who succeed him in it. Why is this? For the answer we have not far to search. Horatio G. Knight was trained by Samuel Williston in his ways of doing business, but the next generation adopted methods and practices which ran counter to the old-fashioned New England ideals. H. Williston Knight, son of the ex-lieutenant governor, brought about a departure from the honorable traditions and safe methods of Mr. Williston. He lived at New York and his ideas of "life" did not tally with the pious ways of that fine old man who had reared a Christian home, given liberally "to support the gospel," and had money to spend in founding an academy and fostering a great college. The young blood was hot and the flashing life of the big city yielded it abundant opportunities for pleasure and folly. Young Knight cut loose from the dull old theories which had encased the founder of a prosperous business, he was sharp enough to get the upper hand of his father in the control of affairs, and he lived full upon the crest of that wave which bears so many young New England men on a merry race to the devil. He became "a well known character about town," spent money freely and "particularly affected the society of fast actresses." The end of all this will surprise no one familiar with the story.

An Old Postmaster General.

The Washington Star has the following: "Judge Lawrenson, the veteran notary of the postoffice department, who has sworn in twenty postmaster generals and served under twenty-seven, in talking to a reporter, said that the venerable Joseph Burrows, one of the earliest officers of the general postoffice, related to him the following incident: "One morning Postmaster General Meigs called me, and, handing me a letter, said, "Mr. Burrows, please take this letter up to the president. It is my resignation." I was greatly surprised at this, but proceeded on his errand. At the White House I found President Monroe in a pleasant mood, and handed him the letter. The president read it, and then said, "Mr. Burrows, please return this letter to the postmaster general with my compliments, and tell him when I want his resignation I will send for it." I then returned with the message."

PENITENTIAL.

SHE.

We shall live to repent—
Prithee heed, love, my warning—
If we marry in Lent,
We shall live to repent.
For if I should consent,
The old proverb's truth scorning,
We should live to repent.
Prithee heed, love, my warning.

HE.

But since all should repent
Let's repent, love, together.
It is proper in Lent
That we all should repent.
Nay, then, sweetheart, consent,
In this sad Lenten weather;
Since we all should repent,
Let's repent, love, together!

"A LOVE OF A BONNET."

"Oh, I want to go! I want to go so much!" said Ella Haskell to herself. "And to think that I must stay at home just for want of a bonnet! It is too bad. I declare it is. I might just as well bought one last week when I went to town, but I thought the fashions were not settled yet. I can't wear black velvet with a blue muslin. And it's the nicest picnic we've had. Oh, dear!"

"A letter, Ell! I've been to the post-office to get 'em. And rice and raisins for a pudding!" shouted little Haskell, tossing a white envelope upon his sisters bureau as he rushed past her door.

"From Cousin Hester," said Ella, glancing at the envelope. "Full of brag as usual, I suppose? What airs she did give herself while she was here, to be sure! All because her father has made a little more money than 'pa has. I wonder she isn't ashamed to write."

However, she opened the letter at once, and sat down to read it. It opened thus:

DEAR ELLA,—I find I have left my bonnet box behind me. I put it on the upper shelf of the closet in my room; and as there was no occasion for anything but my hat, and the bonnet was really too handsome to wear on ordinary occasions, I never looked at it again. Please send it the first opportunity.

Ella read no more. The letter dropped out of her hand. She flew out of her room, and into the spare bedroom that had been given to her cousin during her visit, and there, upon the upper shelf, she found a box, which, being taken down and opened, revealed a dainty bonnet of palest blue satin, with delicate feathers to match, and two pale pink crushed roses daintily perched upon the crown—a bonnet that bore upon its lining the signature of a Parisian milliner.

"The most beautiful bonnet I ever saw!" cried Ella.

As she spoke she perched it lightly on her head, saw that it became her, and on the instant was overcome by temptation.

"If I could only borrow it and wear it at the picnic!" she whispered.

She caught up the hand-glass and looked at her profile. It was the most charming view of her face.

"I will," she added. "Didn't she borrow my blue veil and wear it entirely out, and lose my silver thimble, and tuck up the curtains of her room so that they had to be done over again as soon as she was gone? And it cannot do much harm to a bonnet to wear it once very carefully."

And Ella sat down at once to write a little note of acceptance to the young man who had "requested the pleasure of her company."

"Going?" said Mrs. Haskell, lifting her eyebrows is surprise. "Well, I hope you'll enjoy yourself; but will you feel comfortable in your old bonnet?"

"Well I'll manage somehow, 'ma,'" said Ella, not daring to meet her mother's eye for she knew what her opinion would have been about her borrowing a handsome bonnet in that fashion; and the problem she was now solving was how to conceal the fact that she wore it from the members of the family. The only plan that occurred to her was to cover it with gramma's big brown veil, which she borrowed for the purpose, receiving many injunctions not to tear or lose it.

Silas Perkins came in his trap to the door at the proper hour, and Ella ran out of the house and entered the vehicle rather hastily, with her head apparently enveloped in a snuff colored turban.

Out of sight of the porch, Ella unpinned the snuff-colored veil and, and sat beside Silas Perkins in a blue and rose tinted bonnet that took his breath away with admiration.

In fact, it was the sight of that bonnet, and the pretty face under it, and the tints of gold it brought out in the waving hair, that made Silas forget that his horse Napoleon would not bear the whip, and gave him a graceful flick upon his neck, whereupon Napoleon at once asserted his independence by running away. The road was smooth, and in the course of a quarter of an hour, as Silas declared, he brought that horse to his senses. The actual fact was that Napoleon grew tired of running and moderated his pace. But meanwhile a dreadful thing had happened. The branch of a tree which grazed the vehicle in passing had whipped away that dainty Paris bonnet, which weighed next to nothing, and Ella, as she clutched the back of her seat in terror for her life, was utterly unaware of the fact. In fact, the scene of the picnic was reached before either of the occupants of the vehicle were aware of what had occurred.

Meantime Aunty Wheeler, whose house faced the road, had seen the runaway, and noticed the accident to the bonnet; and had sent her grandson, Peter, to take it from the oak bough. After waiting at her door for an hour and a half she concluded that either Ella was killed or had gone where she lost her bonnet, and returned to her kitchen.

"Carry the bonnet home to Mrs. Haskell's Peter," said she." "Say that Ella lost it, but don't say that she was run away with, for there's no need of frightening her ma without cause. Ella is just hity-tity enough not to know whether her bonnet is on her head or off it."

Peter, a shy, white-headed child, obeyed with with sulky reluctance. He carried the bonnet to the house, and greatly disliking explanations and questions, performed his errand by poking it in at an open window under which a table happened to stand. It was the spare bedroom window, and five minutes after Nancy, the new servant, came into the room to wash that very window. She found the bonnet on a chair, and being a tidy soul, opened the closet and put it into the bonnet-box which stood there, shutting down the cover. Half an hour from that time the spare bed-room had resumed its usual condition of shadowed order.

As for poor Ella, what she suffered no one knew. The picnic was one long misery to her. She thought of nothing but the lost bonnet. If she could have forgotten it, Silas would not have permitted the oblivion, for he talked about it constantly, and the fact that Ella Haskell was run away with and had lost her bonnet, was the topic of the day. Nobody found the lost treasure, of course. And it so happened that during the afternoon Aunty Wheeler was sent for in her capacity of nurse, by a certain Mrs. Jerkins, who lived twenty miles away, and that she did not return to her own home for three good months. Therefore there was no comfort for Ella on her home-coming, and nothing remained for her but full confession. Solemn scenes ensued. Correspondence commenced between the two matrons. Ella had the mortification of knowing that her cousin knew she had borrowed her bonnet because she had no nice one of her own. And horror fell upon the Haskell family when, having insisted on paying for the bonnet, they heard that it cost fifteen dollars.

Ella "did" with her last winter's dress that year, and very shabby it grew before spring, and with spring came a visit from Cousin Hester, who, much against her will was sent to her uncle's by her father every year. More airs, more graces than ever. A large trunk, or rather larger trunks, and more extensive boasting. Ella conducted her relative to the spare bedroom, fresh with its new curtains, and the girl began at once, as Ella had declared she knew she would.

"There's my bonnet-box. Dear me, how did you lose the bonnet without knowing it? You never thought of the long pin. Here it is in the cover. That cost five shillings; it has an enamelled head. I wonder who picked it up. Why, Ella, where did you find it?"

"I never found it," replied Ella, snappishly, "and as 'ma paid for it, I think we may as well drop the subject."

"But here it is," said Hester.

"Here what is?" asked Ella.

"The bonnet," said Hester.

And there it was, indeed, as Ella saw on looking in. Fresh in tint and dainty in shape as ever. How it came there was a mystery doomed never to be unravelled.

The new servant had long before "given sauce" and been dismissed; and Aunty Wheeler had never found time to "slip over to Mrs. Haskell's" in her brief sojourns at home.

Mrs. Haskell declared that Ella never put it on at all; but Silas Perkins, now her accepted lover, remembered the blue satin and crushed roses too well to admit of that explanation. No spiritualists were on hand, and Ella felt the situation beyond her. But she had suffered too much for that bonnet.

"Ma," she said eagerly, "you paid for that bonnet. I went without my winter dress for it. It is mine."

"Well, yes, so it seems to me," said Mrs. Haskell.

"I'm sure I don't want last year's bonnet," said Hester, scornfully.

"Very well; let nobody approach me," said Ella, seizing the tongs which stood near a small fire in the open fireplace.

She left the sitting-room in which this conversation occurred, and returned, bearing the bonnet before her between the tongs.

"There!" she said, depositing it in the midst of the flames. "It is mine, and that is what I choose to do with it."

Nobody stirred. The satin blazed, the flowers crisped to tinder, the feathers smelled as burning feathers will.

"I never knew you had such a temper, Ella," said her mother; but Ella was happy for the first time since she had lost her cousin's bonnet.

A Snake Charmer's Narrow Escape From a Python.

A thrilling incident happened in Forepaugh's circus yesterday afternoon, while Nala Damajante, the Hindoo snake charmer, was going through her performance of handling half-a-dozen squirming pythons. It was all in the twinkling of an eye, and scarcely a dozen persons in the great audience were aware that Damajante had for a moment been in deadly peril. She had finished the wonderful act of walking about the raised platform with six snakes coiled like a living head-dress over her forehead, and had taken the huge python, whose weight is ninety pounds and length twelve feet, from its box, and threw it across her shoulder. As she had done with the other snakes, Damajante grasped the powerful creature a few inches back of the head. Although the air was damp and chilly, the python appeared possessed of more than usual activity. It unwound its sinuous length from Damajante's body and quickly coiled about the upper part of her chest and throat. To those nearest the performer, the muscles of the snake could be distinctly seen working beneath the spotted skin. Suddenly the reptile gave an angry hiss and darted forth its quivering tongue, and almost at the same moment the coil about the woman's throat was tightened. Damajante's agent, who was standing near the entrance to the elephant house, appeared to know that there was a possibility of something of the kind taking place, and was keeping a keen eye on the performance. He started forward quickly but quietly, so as not to alarm the audience, and had got half way down the race track, when Damajante, who had already realized her great danger, succeeded in untwisting the tale end of the snake from her body. The middle and most powerful part of the python was still about her throat, and the pressure was increasing. She was very pale but thoroughly calm. The head of the python, hissing horribly, was still grasped in her right hand. Damajante, with remarkable nerve, managed to free her left arm, and in another instant had, with all the strength she possessed in both hands, unwrapped the writhing necklace from her throat. She placed her dangerous pet back in its box, bowed, and retired.—Philadelphia Press.

Peter Cooper's Sympathy for the Poor.

During the winters of 1874-5, 1875-6 and 1876-7 the sufferings of the poor in New York city, from privation, cold and want of employment were unprecedented in the history of the metropolis. Every day during these long winters, from three o'clock in the afternoon until 6.30, Mr. Peter Cooper sat in his office or library on Lexington avenue, and no one, however shabby in dress was refused admission. On the table before him were piled hundreds of newly coined half-dollars and piles of one-dollar greenbacks, and these piles were replenished every hour by the servant in attendance. His rule was to give every applicant half a dollar in any event, and if the case seemed to be a specially urgent one, the douceur was doubled, with a request either to write a history of the case, have it authenticated by some clergyman or other authority, and send it in for further consideration. As early as 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon crowds of poverty-stricken people—men and women of every nationality and position in life—might be seen gathered in front of Lexington avenue residence, and the amount expended often amounted to $200 in a single day, irrespective of the special cases that were more carefully inquired into, and in which special aid was given. Most of the applicants were strangers, and many, of course, were downright frauds. But the old man proceeded upon the principle that it is better to be deceived by many than to deny one deserving sufferer. He could afford, he used to say, to give half a dollar to anybody who asked for it, irrespective of the merits of the applicant, and time did not permit him to inquire too minutely into the circumstances. His heaviest week during any season aggregated $1,500.

THE FLANEUR.

I love all sights of earth and skies,
From flowers that glow to stars that shine;
The comet and the penny show,
All curious things, above, below,
Hold each in turn my wandering eyes;
I claim the Christian Pagan's line,
Humani nihil,—even so,—
And is not human life divine?

When soft the western breezes blow,
And strolling youths meet sauntering maids,
I love to watch the stirring shades
Beneath the Vallombrosa shades
Our much-enduring elms bestow;
The vender and his rhetoric's flow,
That lambent stream of liquid lies;
The bait he dangles from his line,
The gudgeon and his gold-washed prize.
I halt before the blazoned sign
That bids me linger to admire
The drama time can never tire,
The little hero of the hunch,
With iron arm and soul of fire,
And will that works his fierce desire,—
Untamed, unscared, unconquered Punch!
My ear a pleasing torture finds
In tones the withered sibyl grinds,—
The dame sans merci's broken strain,
Whom I erewhile, perchance, have known,
When Orleans filled the Bourbon throne,
A siren singing by the Seine.

But most I love the tube that spies
The orbs celestial in their march;
That shows the comet as it whisks
Its tail across the planets' disks,
As if to blind their blood-shot eyes;
Or wheels so close against the sun
We tremble at the thought of risks
Our little spinning ball may run,
To pop like corn that children parch,
From summer something overdone,
And roll, a cinder, through the skies.

THE COLONEL.

Few families could be in more desperate straits as to money matters than the Dilloways were, and in few could the fact have been taken with more diversity of opinion. There was Mamma Dilloway, a stately, gray-haired matron, who felt so wronged by circumstances as to be on the edge of a quarrel with the universe. There was Margaret, the beauty, who was in too miserable health to care about money matters, and passed the day on the sofa in languor and indifference. There was Kate, whose situation as a teacher was the mainstay of the house. There were the younger ones, Ethel and Fred and Harry, on whom the world was just beginning to cast a shadow, whose appetites and whose legs grew with every day beyond the bounds of provisions and trousers. And there was Brooks, the proud and suffering eldest son, whose beginning had all come to naught—who cursed poverty as it had cursed him; and there was Maria, the other daughter, who was not a beauty, but who, nevertheless, had that quality of absorbing and reflecting sunshine which brings sunshine into shadow, and who rather relished the tussle with their wants, and always expected victory.

It seemed to Mamma Dilloway, on the morning that Brooks was summoned to Colorado to take the books of an old friend who had fallen ill, that now the worst had come and she should never see her son again.

"On the contrary, mamma," said Maria, who was performing a pas seul, "the universe, you must think, is not such a very ill-managed affair after all. Perhaps we couldn't do better ourselves. King David was quite right," she said, pausing in her waltz. "The dance is the expression of joy, and just now, I'm sure, of religious joy; for if ever anybody was thankful—"

"Maria!" exclaimed her mother.

"You know, mamma, you're as glad as I—"

"I don't know any such short-sighted thing," said Mrs. Dilloway. "Colorado is a long way off and mining life is very rough, and mines are very uncertain, and if Brooks falls ill while alone there with nobody—"

"Just the way Clever Alice reasoned. I'll tell you what, mamma, I'll go with him. Mrs. Byrnes offered me enough for grandma's cashmere shawl to pay my way, and I need an outing, and may find something to do myself."

And before Mrs. Dilloway fairly knew what had happened, Brooks and Maria were on their westward way, having left the whole family aghast at the vision of loneliness, oppressed with anxiety, and wretched with something like grief. They could scarcely have told you how they dragged on an existence through the first dreary weeks. The weather fitted with their feelings, and nothing broke the monotony of their trouble.

"You'll have to come back, Maria," wrote Kate. "The house is getting so damp with mamma's tears that the walls will mildew presently. Margaret, too, turns her face to the back of the sofa, and the tears roll down, one by one, for dreariness. The gloom has even infected Ethel, whose dolls are always going to funerals. There seems to be nothing to do, nothing to expect, nowhere to go. My quarter hasn't yet been paid, and we have short commons, I can tell you. The table emphasizes our low spirits three times a day; but mamma will have it set if there is only potatoes and milk. You were all the life and comfort we had, and now you are gone. But you have had your outing now, and unless you want me to go to an insane asylum you will have to come home and leave Brooks to his fate."

The answer to this letter was of a fortnight's later date. "Come home, indeed," said Maria, "when I'm having the first good time in my life! Such a new and strange life, too! Such an atmosphere, and such scenery—a world of pictures. I suppose you think of us in a desert; but can you muster a dozen superb young Sauls, Englishmen and others, every morning with galloping across country, every evening with music and dancing? You know, so many English of the first water come over to hunt the buffalo and some to take up land for ranches. There is a Mr. Cholmondeley, and Captain Arundel and his sister, and Mr. and Mrs. Cecil, and I don't know how many others, first and last—a new one always turning up. So you see the time passes quite differently from time at home, where you so seldom see a marrying man that, when you do, you think he belongs to another species. Oh, and I must not forget the colonel! Now, what do you think of a real British nobleman, of a family titled since the conqueror—or is it the flood? Colonel Sir Guy Temple! Perfectly charming, and rich beyond calculation—tin mines in Cornwall. I think we shall name the mine for him. By the way, didn't Brooks write you that he has a little mine himself! He has given me half of it!"

And so the letter ran on, and great cheer it brought into that dull place where it was read.

"The colonel," said Mrs. Dilloway reflectively, as Maria knew she would: "Col. Sir Guy Temple. Those old titles think more of themselves than half the ducal houses in the realm. I didn't suppose any but the prince of Wales owned tin mines in Cornwall, though. I wonder if Maria's dresses—"

"Oh, they don't need dresses, mamma, in that life—"

"Not need dresses, Margaret!" cried.

"I mean, mamma, her riding dress, that she made from the waterproof, you remember, is as good as a velvet court-train would be in London."

"Poor Maria isn't really pretty," soliloquized Mrs. Dilloway; "but that's the way things go. What a pity, Margaret, that you couldn't have gone out with Brooks!"

"Oh, Maria's brightness is just as good for her as beauty," said Kate.

"If she only could be comfortably established! That would help all the rest, too. It's too good to hope for, though, in this family."

"Well, perhaps she will be. She certainly has a chance."

And somehow the gray weather was not quite so gray to Mrs. Dilloway and her daughters; it half seemed to them as if the cloud might be about to lift, and in the vague sense of unconjectured possibilities, Mrs. Dilloway felt rich enough to call in a ragged urchin and make him neat with an outfit of Fred's and Harry's cast-off garments that had already been patched and darned into another color.

"We are just in from a long gallop," another letter of Maria's ran. "The wind is giving me quite a color. I shall turn out pretty before you know it. There are some folks who seem to think I am already. The air is so clear you think you are on wings. I wish Margaret were here. I really think it would do her good. It would do her good, too, to have a little of this gay life. It really enlarges and opens your horizon. Mrs. Cecil now has yatched up under the Midnight Sun. When she tells me about it I feel as if I had, too. She has told me all about the Temple Gardens in Cornwall, Sir Guy's place—you were so interested in my mention of him that I will tell you—running down to the shore and quenching all their flaming blossoms in the silver wash of the sea there. A fine old Elizabethan place, the mansion is, she says, ivy-covered, with all its quadrangles and courts and wings and stacked chimneys and stables. On the walls of the long hall every Lady Temple, one after the other, for how many hundred years I can't say, makes room for the next one. Think of hanging up your picture there, to look out on the world long after your eyes are dust in their sockets! There are some haunted diamonds in the family, too. Did you ever hear of such a thing? Along the year of the marriage of the heir they blaze like bonfires, with a white light far eclipsing their real luster; and just before the death of a Temple they blaze again with a baleful red torchlight, and then are dull and ordinary diamonds, not particularly well cut. Mrs. Cecil hinted to me that they were blazing like comets when Sir Guy sent them to the banker's just before he sailed. Sir Guy is very democratic, and doesn't like titles—almost ready to drop his own, and would if the others would. He told Mrs. Cecil if ever she met him in America to call him plain colonel, and she promised. But she told me all about him. She used to think he would marry Miss Arundel, her sister. Miss Arundel is very pretty, and blushes like a peach when you speak to her."

"People get intimate so quickly in such places," said Kate.

"A great piece of folly," said Mamma Dilloway, at this point of the letter. "To think of dropping his father's title—a title won centuries ago. These democratic notions! As for my opinion, there is something in the stability of the British government that more than compensates for the differences in caste. And as for those differences," said Mrs. Dilloway, looking out the window and over the rainy fields, pausing a moment to think of the contrast between such an outlook and that of Sir Guy Temple's gardens, "I will admit that it always was irksome to me to shake hands with the tradespeople."

"Oh, mamma, mamma!" cried Kate. "When you know how glad we would be this minute if Fred had a place with the grocer!"

"I don't know anybody, Kate," said Mrs. Dilloway severely, "who has the faculty you have of obtruding the vulgarity of every day upon the Ideal. If the contemplation of the marriage of your sister with a British nobleman affords me pleasure, I don't see why you should interfere with it, especially as we should then all go and live with her, and become English people ourselves, to all intents and purposes. Lady Temple—Lady Temple—" and then, as she saw the girls laughing, she broke into a merry laugh herself—the first laugh that that had been seen on her face for years, let it be said.

In the week before a fresh letter came the Dilloway family had nearly worn the last to shreds. But at length Mamma Dilloway tore open another, and having learned that Brooks was well, had nearly cleared up the books, and was busy with his interest in the operations out there, ran hastily into his gossip.

"What does she mean about those operations?" she asks, looking back with a second thought.

"Oh, the little mine he happened on, don't you recollect? when he first went out; great piece of good luck, Maria said; doesn't come to one in a thousand. That may make our fortune yet."

"If we wait for a Colorado mine to make our fortunes," began Mrs. Dilloway, with majesty.

"We might as well make them ourselves," said Kate. "Come, come, mamma—the news about Col. Sir Guy Temple?"

"Col. Sir Guy Temple," said Mrs. Dilloway solemnly, "is engaged to marry your sister Maria."

It seemed to Kate as if a voice has added, "Let us pray." And there was a dead silence for a moment or two.

"I feel," said their mother, "that it is too tremendous an event to read about in our usual light way. But it is not the Englishman, it is not the title, it is not the place by the Cornish sea—I would rather, really rather, there were none of that about it at all. I would, on the whole, rather give her to one of our own countrymen. In spite of things I may have said, I can see that this may separate us more widely than distance or the sea; I shall find it hard to surrender her; and so will you. All that gives a tinge of sadness to the joy. But it is a comfort, an unspeakable comfort, to think that even one of my children is to be established in ease and safety. I could prefer it were that little mine developed into wealth, that would let her and Brooks have all they wanted, and let us still have them. But it is a great deal to be grateful for, as it is. It doesn't strike her so, though, at all. You will see that she treats it in rather a frivolous way. But that is natural to youth and joy, I suppose." And in spite of her little speech, Mamma Dilloway's face was wreathed with smiles as she read:

"Well, to come to something really important. You remember, of course, all I have written you from time to time about Col. Sir Guy Temple, who has served in India and has the Victoria cross, and all that? Well, he is going home to England. Perhaps he is tired of buffalo hunting, perhaps he has brought down better game. At any rate, he will take his wife with him. Mamma, I never was so surprised. But I must wait till I see you. And I don't really feel as if I had told you anything about the Colonel, after all. It would be difficult to say how much I am interested; how enchanting it all is! What a different life I see before me—immense riches, honors, troops of friends—and all as much yours as mine, dear people at home. But I shall see you soon."

Mrs. Dilloway went about treading on air. What matter that the roof leaked, and the rain ran down the walls? It was merely a frescoing there. What matter that the milkman dunned a second time, and said he would not ask a third? She hoped he wouldn't. What had seemed unendurable three months ago she could laugh at now; three months more, six months more, and there would come an end to all these bitter experiences. The fact of Maria's being well married would marry off all the other girls; and even were her husband parsimonious, what Maria could spare from her pin money would put them beyond want any more. The sun had come out, the landscape was bathed in beauty, life smiled, all the world seemed propitious—the universe was really better managed than she had thought. Mrs. Dilloway retrimmed her bonnet and went to church with her good spirits, feeling in a thankful mood. It was pleasant to see the neighbors—smiling at one and bowing to another; it put the neighbors in mind of her, too; and they came to see her that week, and the next, and made it more cheerful than it had been for months. She hinted mysteriously at Maria's good fortune, but was not sure that she ought to commit herself. Good friends, good fortune and good feeling all gave her a sensation resembling the happiness she used to know; she radiated it on Margaret and the rest till you would never have dreamed it was the tear-sodden family of which Maria and Brooks took leave in the gray of the morning a dozen weeks ago.

"I have been darkly hinting at good fortune," wrote Maria in her last letter.

"I'm sure I don't know what she means by 'darkly hinting,'" said her mother. "It was all plain enough to me."

"Go on, go on, mamma!"

"'I have been darkly hinting at good fortune, and see how you read the riddle. Give me Mamma Dilloway for a good guesser. The sphinx would sink in the sands before her. How much interest you have taken in the matter from the first! What do you suppose Sir Guy Temple could have seen in me? Do you imagine he is marrying me for my beauty? How many ideas you have about the wedding! But don't you incline to a quiet one always? Are you going to call me 'My lady,' mamma, and treat me with great respect? Sir Guy Temple or no Sir Guy Temple—after all, the colonel has great charms for me—my dearest, sweetest people at home, I shall always be your Maria.'"

"Maria will always be frivolous and a little incoherent," half sighed Mrs. Dilloway, yet with the feeling that a Lady Temple could afford to be frivolous and incoherent—Lady Temple of Temple Gardens, Cornwall, whose Elizabethan mansion was encircled with flowers and seas; and she saw her daughter dressed out in the haunted diamonds, saw her portrait hanging in the ancient hall, and she washed her cups and saucers that morning with sighs of satisfaction over the divine compensations of this life.

She was rubbing the last plating off the spoons—the real silver had gone long ago to the melter's—with the old bit of chamois cloth, and singing gently to herself, when she looked up at the slamming door, and a vision of splendor that took her breath away—Maria, in broad hat and feathers, making her really attractive, with her black hair and blue eyes, and in a dress that was all one sparkle of jet to her mother's bewildered eyes, glistening and dancing like a windy midnight full of stars. The next moment chamois and spoons were whirling in a cloud of whirling whiting, and Maria was kissing her mother's cheeks and chin and mouth and forehead.

"Oh, you dear, silly little Mamma Dilloway!" cries Maria. "Are you glad to see me?" And have you really guessed all this time what has happened?"

"Happened!" cried Mamma Dilloway. "Have you married without waiting to come home?" quite prepared, however to forgive her if she had. "Where is your husband, then? Where is Sir Guy Temple? I should like to see him."

"Sir Guy Temple? So should I. I never did."

"You—never—did!"

"No, indeed. Mrs. Cecil knew him. I didn't."

"You—didn't! Then how—then where—are you crazy, Maria? Has your good fortune turned your head? If you never saw Sir Guy Temple, if you don't know him, how in the world are you married to him?"

"I'm not."

"Are you going to marry him?" with ominous calmness.

"I am not going to marry him or anybody else. But I am going to do something much pleasanter. I am going to sit down here the mistress of as much money as I want; and so are you, and so are all the rest of us; money that will make our old place an Eden, and educate the boys as well as all the Sir Guy Temples that were ever born!"

"Maria," said Mrs. Dilloway, in a sepulchral voice that came from the depths into which she had fallen in her new despair, "I can't believe a word you say!"

"Oh, yes, you can, mamma. The Colonel has made us all rich—really rich. The Colonel, you know, is Brooks' mine. I was so interested in it all—it was so enchanting—but I didn't dare at first to tell you very much about him for fear of disappointment. And when I found from your letters that you were taking my casual mention of Sir Guy Temple with such roseate ideas, I thought I would just lead you along to pass the time till we found out where we were."

"Maria! A child of mine—"

"If we panned out poorly I meant to let you down gently, and you would have been beguiled of some melancholy, you see, anyway. If otherwise, you wouldn't need any letting down. And he has, mamma, oh, the Colonel has—"

"Maria, I don't understand you. How am I to believe this, if I am not to believe that? You are now giving me to understand that Brooks' little mine has lifted us out of poverty and distress. This morning you gave me to understand that you were to marry Sir Guy Temple."

"I never did, mamma. You gave yourself to understand so."

"When you said you were going back to England with Sir Guy Temple as his wife?"

"I never said so, mamma. Mrs. Cecil said he was going to take a wife back with him when he came up from Arizona. I didn't say it was I. And I didn't say it was Miss Arundel, although she did. But Mrs. Cecil is a humbug, and I think she was playing off on me."

"And what did you mean about the wedding?" gasped Mrs. Dilloway.

"Oh, that was something you took for granted, you see. But when I give you Brooks' word for it, in a check signed, sealed and delivered, that he has sold out his interest in the Colonel mine for more than $500,000, and has divided it, share and share alike, among us all, you'll believe that? So you thought to see me in the haunted diamonds? I'll tell you what, mamma," tilting back her mother's chin and kissing her thin lips, "no more tears in those eyes, remember! I'll tell you what, I'll haunt Mrs. Byrnes if she doesn't sell me back grandma's cashmere shawl! Sir Guy Temple? For my part—do you remember what Mrs. Prigg said to Mrs. Gamp about Mrs. Harris, mamma? 'I don't believe there's no sich person!'"

WHO DID IT?

"Who made those marks?" asks stern papa,
"Who's pencil is to blame?"
The wall is spoilt—"Come, children, here"—
He calls them each by name,
But not a child has seen the marks;
Each "guesses" 'twas some other.
"We'll find this out," persists papa,
"I'll go and ask your mother."

But she knows nothing of the mark
(Made since the day began),
And quite determined to find out,
She asks each little man.
Then guiltily George lifts his eyes,
And whispers loud, "Mamma,
I dess I know who made those marks-
I dess it was papa!"

TALES FOR TODDLERS.

Where Tom Found His Manners.

Tom's father was a rich man, and Tom lived in a large house in the country. He had a pony and many other pets, and wore fine clothes. Tom was very proud of all the fine things his father's money bought. He began to think that being rich was better than being good. He grew very rude, and was cross to the servants. Once he kicked Towser; but the dog growled, and Tom was afraid to kick him again.

One day when Tom was playing in the yard he saw a boy standing by the gate. He was ragged and dirty, his hat was torn, and his feet were bare. But he had a pleasant face. In one hand he carried a pail half full of blackberries.

"Go away from here," said Tom, running to the gate. "We are rich, and we don't want ragged boys around."

"Please give me a drink," said the boy. "If you are so rich, you can spare me a dipper of water."

"We can't spare you anything," said Tom. "If you don't go away I will set the dogs on you."

The boy laughed and walked away, swinging the tin pail in his hand.

"I think I will get some blackberries, too," said Tom to himself. He went out of the gate into a lane leading to a meadow where there were plenty of berries.

Tom saw some fine large ones growing just over a ditch. He thought he could leap over it very easily. He gave a run and a big jump. The ditch was wider than he had thought, and instead of going over it, he came down in the middle of it.

The mud was very thick and soft, and Tom sank down in it to his waist. He was very much frightened, add screamed for help. But he had not much hope that help would come, for he was a long way from any house.

He screamed until he was tired. He began to think he would have to spend the night in the ditch, when he heard steps in the grass. Looking up he saw the ragged boy he had driven from the gate.

"Please help me out," said Tom, crying. "I will give you a dollar."

"I don't want the dollar," said the boy, lying down flat on on the grass. He held out both his hands to Tom, and drew him out of the ditch.

Tom was covered with mud, his hat was gone, and one shoe was lost in the ditch. He looked very miserable.

"Who is dirty now?" asked the boy.

"I am," said poor Tom, "but I thank you very much for helping me out of the mire. And I am sorry I sent you away from the gate."

"The next time I come perhaps you will treat me better," said the boy, "I am not rich, but I am stronger than you are, and I think I have better manners."

"I think so, too," said Tom.

The next day, when Tom saw the boy going by the gate, he called him in, showed his rabbits, doves, and little ducks, and gave him a ride on his pony.

"You have got better manners now," said the boy.

"Yes," said Tom, "I found them in the ditch."

The Three Hundred and Six Medals.

The New York Sun tells a queer story about the medals struck for Gen. Grant's supporters at the Republican National convention in 1880, in memory of their signal defeat. According to our contemporary, these medals arrived in a box from St. Louis at Senator Don Cameron's house just on the eve of the Independent State convention in Pennsylvania. One or two of the renowned 306, who were with Mr. Cameron at the time, received their medals at once, "with an injunction of secrecy." It was not considered safe to let the thing go out under the circumstances then existing. The other medals were put aside "until the campaign should be over." But when the campaign was over the result of it did not seem to encourage their public exhibition. And now, the Sun reports, Senator Cameron, "in overhauling his rubbish, preparatory to going abroad, has found these medals, and thinks it a good time to distribute them. The boys here (at Philadelphia) are showing them as great curiosities." Undoubtedly their distribution now will be perfectly harmless. We feel sure if Gen. Grant should become a candidate for the presidency and be defeated in the convention once more his friends would never again think of having a medal struck in commemoration of the event.

The Queer Complication.

Dallas, Tex., Special to St. Louis Republican: John N. McDonald, members of the Thirteenth legislature, a leading lawyer and mayor of the city of Athens, died at that place yesterday. His death complicates the municipal government matters worse than ever. At the late election negroes were elected to the office of mayor, city marshal, city attorney, etc., and the board of white aldermen refused to qualify them in order to break up the city government and let the town lapse back under country jurisdiction, the combination with the negroes having been made for that purpose. Mayor McDonald and his associate city officers, including aldermen, determined to hold over and contest for the perpetuation of the city charter. McDonald's death now brings the negro forward demanding possession of the office of mayor. There is no way to keep him out unless the old aldermen recede and let the corporation charter lapse. If the negro mayor is allowed to take his seat, then all the other negro officers must be recognized. It is not known what the result will be.

BALLADE OF LIGHT HO

'Tis a subtly sweet suggestive phrase,
But the simply soul who is lured thereby
Will make a sorrow for many days,
In secret oft will he moan and cry,
And vote the thing a tremendous lie,
For it means, this phrase that sounds so fair,
A world of trouble and toil and care;
And a wild, distracting wish to go,
Away from it soon and anywhere;
I speak of the things whereof I know.

It means little transparent ways
To hide away from the common eye
The fact that your bread and butter stays
In your desk; that you bake and broil and fry
In a single dish. It means to try
To hang your garments, the best you wear,
In a folding bed, that last despair
Of honest souls; and, bitterest blow,
It makes a kitcheny-parlor air.
I speak of things whereof I know.

It means to shrink 'neath the stern amaze
Of the lordly butcher's and baker's eye:
Apologizing in meek dispraise
For your modest wants. To rave or sigh,
Over the pangs of a boughten pie.
'Tis to pray a strong, heav'n reaching prayer
For the meal of a man pronounces "square,"
And to be once more in life below
Free from that peace-destroying snare:
I speak of the things whereof I know.

ENVOY.

Ye who are tempted this life to share,
Pause ere ye enter the tiger's lair;
Consider the truth I fain would show,
For with hand on heart I firmly swear,
I speak of the things whereof I know.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

Closet Room.

"A place for everything, and everything in its place" is an adage familiar to us all, and full of wisdom. But to keep "everything in its place" one must have a place for everything, and this is not always easy to have. Many houses are built with a lamentable want of closets, for closets are expensive in room, material and labor. In planning a house they are frequently, if not generally, an afterthought, and are thrown in where space for them can best be afforded. When women plan their own houses there will be ample allowance of closet room. If one has plenty of money, cabinets, wardrobes, chests can be bought that are at once ornamental and useful, and form part of the furnishing, but the main dependence of the average housekeeper must be closets. These, when furnished with shelves, drawers and rows of hooks are an unspeakable comfort and convenience to the order loving housewife. In city houses, where everything is constructed with a view to economy in space, we often find them, but in the average country house very rarely.

So there must be recourse to bureaus, boxes, bags, chests and improvised closets. The last may be constructed wherever there is space to put a shelf, and may be of the size of the shelf in length and width. Hooks screwed into the bottom of the shelf will serve to hang garments on, and a curtain may be hung on rods fastened to the shelf. A valance tacked above the rods on the shelf will form a more complete protection from dust than the curtain alone. In many rooms that are closetless a corner can be spared, and may be made either into a triangular or a rectangular closet, as suits the fancy or convenience. Weights sewed into the hem of the curtain will keep it in place. Goods boxes made very useful closets for kitchen or cellar work. Shelves may be put in them, and the covers, hinged properly, serve as doors. With a covering of paper or a coat of paint they may be made not unpleasing to the eye. Shoe boxes, used by shoe packers, are very useful as substitutes for closet room. The covers should be hinged to the box, and these neatly upholstered to form a pleasant seat. Furniture calico fastened around them in ruffles or folds conceals the angles and the wood, and converts utility into beauty. Room can readily be found for these, and they fill the places of chairs or lounges quite well. Soap boxes and candle boxes and starch boxes make very convenient receptacles for small articles if they have covers hinged on, and are lined with paper and covered on the outside with pictures or calico pasted on. A couple of hinges, less than a dozen screws, a little taste and odd pieces of paper or cloth, may be made to transform an ugly box into a thing of useful comeliness.

Bags in every variety and shape are needed by the housekeeper. A stout piece of nice bagging makes a good clothes bag; an end of a rope should be sewed into the hem, so the top of the bag may always be hospitably open. One of these hung in every bedroom is indispensable, and makes the gathering of clothes for the weekly washing a very easy matter. Shoe bags are a great convenience, and can be made so as to hold one or a dozen pairs of shoes, and keep them from gathering dust and mold in closet corners, besides preventing the vexation of hunting them up when wanted. Scrap bags are a necessity, and may be made very ornamental by the exercise of taste. They are indispensable in every room in the house. Instead of bags, baskets or jars may be used, and these can be made handsome by the exercise of skill and taste.

Wall pockets and brackets are very great conveniences where one lacks closet room and shelf room. The former may be made of splints or pasteboard covered with cloth and trimmed with cord and embroidery. A wall pocket with many compartments tacked on the inside or a closet door may serve many valuable purposes, especially where there is a family of children and a great many other things "lying around." A label on each pocket will help keep things in the right place, and prevent the shoelaces from getting mixed with the calico pieces or the knitting work.

It takes time to create places to put things in, and it takes time to keep them in place, but not more time than it takes to hunt them up when they may be anywhere and everywhere and belong nowhere. The satisfaction of knowing that at a moment's notice, in the middle of the night or in broad daylight, one can put her hand on whatever in her domain is called for, is a great satisfaction to the orderly housekeeper, and one which she will contrive in one way or another not do without.

Recipes for Summer.

Raspberry water ice: Press sufficient raspberries through a hair sieve to give three pints of juice, and add one pound of pulverized sugar and the juice of one lemon.

Lemon water ice: Juice of six lemons, two teaspoonfuls of extract of lemon, one quart of water, one pound of granulated sugar, one gill of rich, sweet cream. Add all together and strain.

Italian orange ice cream: One pint of best cream, twelve ounces of pulverized sugar, the juice of six oranges, two teaspoonfuls of orange extract, the yolks of eight eggs and a pinch of salt.

Red currant fruit ice: Put three pints of ripe currants, one pint of red raspberries, half a pint of water in a basin. Place on fire and simmer for a few minutes, then strain. Bdd twelve ounces of sugar and half a pint of water.

Coffee ice cream: One quart of best cream, half a pint of strong coffee, fourteen ounces white pulverized sugar, yolks of eight eggs. Mix in a porcelain lined basin; place on the fire to thicken and strain through a hair sieve. Put into a freezer and freeze.

Lemon ice cream: One quart of best cream, eight ounces of pulverized sugar, three whole eggs and a tablespoonful of extract of lemon. Place on the fire, stirring continually until it reaches the boiling point, then remove and strain into the freezer.

Biscuit glaze: One pint and a half of cream, the yolks of eight eggs and one tablespoonful of vanilla; take six ounces of crisp macaroons and pound to a dust; then stir into it another tablespoonful of vanilla; mix the cream, sugar and vanilla; place on the fire and stir until it begins to thicken; strain into the freezer, and when nearly frozen add the macaroon dust and finish. Eggs can be left out of all ice cream recipes if desirable.

Useful Recipes.

While it is the true way to put the piece of corned beef in cold water in the kettle, a chicken should never be treated in this way. A general rule cannot be applied to fowls and meat; experience proves that hardly any two articles of food can be cooked alike; hence there is great opportunity for the exercise and development of judgment. A chicken should be washed in lukewarm water, and then put in hot water with a little salt scattered in it; let it come to a boil, and then after this it is best to let it cool slowly. It is sometimes improved in flavor by cutting a part of a lemon in slices and letting it boil with the chicken; this is particularly the case when the fowl is very fat.

Spinach treated in the following way is excellent: After boiling until it is tender, drain the spinach by placing it on a sieve and taking care to have all the water drained out; then chop it quite fine, and put it in a frying pan with a good large lump of butter, some pepper and salt, stir it, and let it heat for about five minutes; serve it hot, with a little vinegar poured over it, and with hard-boiled eggs cut in slices and arranged around the edge of the dish. Lemon juice may be used in place of vinegar, if you prefer it, and in that case send the lemon cut in halves to the table on a separate dish.

Chocolate blanc-mange is a simple and easily made dish. Dissolve half a package of gela- [illegible] the [illegible] cove and stir [illegible] a time, so that it [illegible] distributed through the milk: Then pour into cups or moulds. This is to be eaten cold, with sugar and cream. Flavor the cream with vanilla.

Delicious puffs for tea are made by beating the yolks of six eggs till they are very light; stir in a pint of sweet milk, a large pinch of salt, the whites of the eggs beaten to a froth, and flour enough to make a batter about as thick as boiled custard. Bake in gem pans in a quick oven.

If you have cold chicken left from dinner, and do not know what to do with it, as there is not enough for a meal, try this way of disposing of it: Mince it quite fine, adding some minced ham and bread crumbs, moisten with cream, season with pepper and salt, put it in a pudding dish, and spread a thin coating of butter over the top; set it in the oven and let it bake until it is nicely browned on the top. This is a good dish for tea.

Soft gingerbread, made with sugar instead of molasses, helps to give variety. Half a pound of sugar should be rubbed with three ounces of butter until the butter is soft as cream. To this should be added two well-beaten eggs, one teaspoonful and a half of ginger, half a spoonful of soda dissolved in a little water, and a half cup of milk or cream, and flour enough to make soft batter. Bake as soon as it is mixed, in a hot oven. Eat while fresh.

To make a good tapioca pudding let one cup of tapioca soak in cold water until it is very soft, then boil it in milk; nearly a quart of milk may be used with one cup of tapioca; let it boil for twenty minutes; add a little salt when first put in the milk; when like jelly pour it into cups; let it stand until it is cold, then serve with a dessertspoonful of currant jelly on the top of each cup. Serve with sugar and cream. Lemon jelly may be used in place of the other if you choose.

Household Hints.

A neat lambrequin for the mantel of a common sitting-room is made of a strip of crash about ten inches deep; fringe the edge to the depth of two or three inches, and then after overcasting the edge where the fringing ceases with thread of the same color, embroider in one color little figures which may consist of rushes and leaves alone if you please. If these figures are woven in the crash it is a very simple matter to outline them; if not, they may be stamped on the crash itself or on paper, over which you may work it.

A pretty way to vary the tidies made of seine twine is to crochet a chain of about one hundred stitches, then go across it with nine closely-knit stitches, and then with a space of equal width of open work, and so on, forming a solid square and one of open work. The three chains between the blocks should have fifteen stitches in two, and fourteen in the middle chain, the upper chain to be caught to the center of the others. Tidies made in this way are pretty when lined with blue or cardinal silesia, and are particularly adapted to the backs of rattan or willow chairs.

If you are so fortunate as to have velvet or even satin-lined cases for teaspoons and forks, do not read this: To protect the silver in common use from scratching, take a strip of the heaviest canton flannel; have it wide enough so that, after laying the forks or spoons on it, the cloth can be folded over them; stitch a band of the flannel to the upper part of it and fasten, leaving spaces or loops through which to pass the silver.

Hard-boiled eggs are good food for canaries, but the shells should not be put in the cage, as there is danger of the female birds learning to eat the shells of their own eggs. Cayenne pepper is a sort of tonic for canaries; it is a good plan to keep a red pepper pod in the cage and let them help themselves to it.

A SAD FATE.

Death of Emma Verne, the Former Wife of Charles L. Davis, "Alvin Joslin," in a Leadville Almshouse.

Emma Verne, the divorced wife of Charles L. Davis, the actor, died in Leadville last Friday morning in the most abject poverty. Her life of recent years has been a succession of strange vicissitudes. Not very long ago, under the stage name of Cora Cushman, she was one of the greatest favorites on the variety boards. She was young, pretty in face and figure, and possessed just enough vocal ability to make her stage appearance a success. She appeared at most of the leading Eastern vaudeville theaters, and never waited for engagements, as managers thrust them upon her. While enjoying this heyday of professional popularity she met and immediately fell in love with Charles L. Davis, then a second or third-rate variety performer, but now known to the profession as "Diamond Charlie," the man who made Alvin Joslin and his own fortune. Shortly after her first meeting with Davis, Miss Cushman married him, and they traveled the circuits together as Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Davis. About this time a new star burst upon the theatrical firmament, and a new character was placed before the American theater-going public. Denman Thompson created Uncle Joshua Whitcomb, and the people went wild over the eccentricities of the New England farmer. The usual army of imitators sprang up, and among them Charles L. Davis. He possessed in a certain degree the qualifications necessary to a fair interpretation of Thompson's creation, and he manufactured a play entitled Alvin Joslin, in which he acted the title role, a tolerable counterpart of Uncle Josh. He procured a cheap company, started on the road, and in a short time became wealthy. As his worldly store increased, however, his domestic happiness decreased, until at length he and his wife separated by mutual consent. He claimed that she had fallen into dissolute habits and injured him both financially and socially; and she claimed that he cruelly ill-treated her. About three years ago he procured a divorce and she drifted Westward. She appeared in Leadville as a serio-comic vocalist about two years ago, under the professional name of Emma Verne, and at the expiration of her engagement returned to Denver. Last fall she revisited Leadville and appeared at the Globe theater, but was discharged for drunkenness, and then drifted to a dance hall, where she acted as bartender. Two months ago her paramour, proprietor of the dancing house, sent her to the Sisters' hospital, where she was treated for inflammatory rheumatism and alcoholism. Under the kind care of the Sisters the poor unfortunate rapidly recovered health and strength, and three weeks ago she was discharged from the hospital, with an admonition from the physician to abstain from dissipation of any kind if she wished to save her life. Instead of obeying the injunction, however, she fell into her old habits and was cast off by the man who had sent her to the hospital. She became an object of charity to her friends, but they supplied her with everything she desired—including liquor—as they had a premonition that her tenure of life was limited. On Thursday night she visited police headquarters and stated her intention of going to the poor house. She asked for a carriage, but was told that she could ride to the almshouse in a wagon belonging to that institution. She refused to do this, as she thought it was the small pox wagon that was referred to. At last she took some jewelry and asked for the loan of some money on it. Receiving this she procured a carriage and drove to the almshouse, where she went to bed and a few hours after passed away to that bourne from whence no traveler returns. Passed away, alone and friendless in a strange land, while the man she once called husband is left behind in worldly affluence, respected and esteemed among the men and women of his profession. He has already been informed of the terrible end of her whom he once promised to protect and cherish, but it is the opinion of those who knew the man that the information will not grieve him.

Jay Cooke on 'Change Again.

New York Special: A tall, elderly man, wrapped in a blue cloak that had seen service, and wearing a broad-brimmed, light-colored felt hat, came down Wall street from Broadway this afternoon. He attracted no attention, for oddly-dressed people are not uncommon in Wall street. At the corner of Wall and New streets he encountered Sam Wilkeson, of the Northern Pacific Railway company. After a hearty greeting, the two remained on the corner, apparently surveying the street. The man with the blue mantle and white hat was Jay Cooke. As he walked down Wall street it was noticeable that he did not turn his head as he passed by his historic old quarters at the corner of Wall and Nassau streets. It is said that to-day was the first time he had been seen in Wall street since 1873.

Unlike Judge Gresham.

Judge James Lawrenson, the veteran notary of the postoffice department at Washington, tells the following story, of Gideon Granger of Connecticut, who was postmaster general many years ago. Starting from home for the capitol, he said to the boy who was selling tickets for passage in the stage coach: "I am the postmaster general. You must let me ride free." "Are you, really?" "Yes." "Then gimme your hat," and seizing the hat the boy wrote on it with chalk: "Pass this man free;" and Mr. Granger rode all the way to Washington on, or rather under, that unique pass.

FIRST DAY.

Now lay your penitential robes aside,
The worn and faded garments of your care,
Your heavy labor's rough arrayment hide;
Apparel ye for peace, and praise, and prayer.

Come up, come up from all your narrow ways,
The darksome purlieus of your toil forsake,
Come out, come out into the glory-blaze
That far along the storm-washed hights doth beat.

"'Tis finished!" Hear the Easter cry
Sung week by week into the waking ear;
Lay, O Jerusalem, thy anguish by,
Warfare is ended, holy peace is here!

See, all thy temple gates are open flung,
The souls new washed of all thy tribes are there;
From vale to vale the holy bells are rung,
From hill to hill is chant of lowly prayer.

Thy little ones that ever in their play
Are sweet and safe about the kingdom's gate,
Are led far on in happy band to-day,
To know their birthright in its wide estate.

Hear sweet forgiveness singing once again!
See Grace, the silent angel of the air,
Pour her soft sunlight over all the plain,
Move her sweet searching breezes everywhere.

O winds of God, pure breathings of the Spring,
So full of light, so full of piercing songs
And fragrance, find out our loitering,
And sweep from us the taint of prison wrongs.

Fast as the sacred hours do set us free,
Our faces to your freshening we lift;
Fill the glad day with larger liberty,
"For man!" so ran its tender deed of gift.

"For man!" Ah then! thou priceless pearl of days
Pledge of our birthright clasping the week's span!
Then are for man all high and holy ways,
And then are heaven and God himself for man!

FOR RELIGIOUS REFLECTION.

Religious Liberty in Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia Record: The action of the house of Representatives in defeating the passage of Bill No. 90, exempting all observers of the seventh day as the Sabbath from the penalties of the Sunday law of 1794, is a sad comment on the intelligence of the law-makers of Pennsylvania. For the past eight years a similar law has been introduced in the senate, and in 1881 it lacked but one vote of passing that body. This year it was defeated in the senate committee, but was reported to the house, and on Thursday came up on second reading. It was supported in an able speech by Hon. Robert C. McNamara from Bedford county, where large numbers of Seventh-day people reside, and also by Hon. Emanuel Furth of this city, but was opposed by Rev. James Neill, a local Methodist preacher of the Fifteenth ward, by Hon. Jacob Zeigler of Butler county and Hon. Nathaniel Horne of Cambria county. The bill was defeated by 37 yeas to 130 nays.

Bigotry—religious bigotry—is one of the most difficult prejudices to overcome, and in this age of the world there is no excuse for such action by the legislature of Pennsylvania. Were this a trial case—if such a bill had never been passed before in other States—there might be some slight excuse for hesitation to pass such an exemption law in Pennsylvania; but it is not a trial case. In eighteen States of the Union where Sunday laws exist, exemption laws have been passed granting to observers of the seventh day as the Sabbath entire freedom from fines and imprisonment if they work on Sunday. Whether Messrs. Neill, Buttermore, Zieger and Horne are aware of this fact we know not; but we presume that even if they were, it would make little difference. To such men, whose piety consists in the observance of particular days, toleration seldom extends any further.

The Buddhist Monks.

The Rev. Father Huc, a Roman Catholic missionary in Tartary and Thibet, describes his surprise at his first sight of the vast and numerous Buddhist monasteries in those regions. The first to which he came had in it 2,000 monks, or lamas; but afterward he reached another where there were 30,000 lamas, with an abbot at their head, whose power was so great that the emperor of China was constantly in fear of his influence over the Tartar tribes. The Buddhist monks, he found, take the same three vows which are imposed on all the orders of Christian monks—namely, of poverty, chastity and obedience. And all the Buddhist priests are monks, and nearly all are mendicants. They go out every day, stopping for a minute in silence before each house, and receive the rice, which may be put into the bowl which they carry. If none is given to them, they go on in silence to the next house. This is done when they are near cities or towns; but when, like father Huc's hospitable entertainers, they are from any surrounding population, they are allowed, it seems, to support themselves by pastoral and agricultural labors. One of the great lamaseries in Chinese Tartary, where Father Huc was entertained, is described by him thus: He arrived in the place at 9 o'clock in the evening, and was met by four lamas, of whom he says that their red scarf, their yellow cap shaped like a mitre, their grave manners and low voices, made on him a profound impression. "They seemed," said he, "to waft toward us the breath of a monastic, religious life. In order not to disturb the deep silence which hushed the place, the bells on the horses were stuffed with straw. Slowly and without speaking, they passed along those calm and deserted streets." This solemn and majestic silence, as he calls it, was only interrupted by the hollow and melancholy sound of a horn which marked the watches of the night. He here inhabited a house lent to him without charge by its owner, who was one of those peaceful monks. It contained large rooms, a kitchen with cooking utensils, and a stable for his horse and mule. Hereupon the good Roman Catholic exclaims: "How powerful is religion over the heart of man, even when it is a false religion. What a difference between these lamas, so hospitable, generous and brotherly in their treatment of strangers, and the covetous Chinese, who even demanded payment of the traveler for a glass of water." The lamas helped him move into his house, carrying his baggage on their shoulders; swept his rooms, lighted his fire, got ready the stable, and finished by giving him a dinner.

The Song of Solomon.

The religious people of St. Louis are excited by a newspaper controversy about the book in the Bible known as The Song of Solomon. The more conservative among the clergy say that it is as much inspired as any other book in the Bible; that Solomon wrote it; that it is an allegorical picture of the mystical union of Christ and His church; and that every one who denies these statements is a rank heretic. One of these, the Rev. Dr. Brookes, thus explains the meaning of the book: "It is called the Song of Solomon; elsewhere we read that he made over a thousand songs, but this was pre-eminently his, setting forth in the glowing language of the Orient the all-consuming love of God for his people. It has always been so understood, and the loveliest and purest lessons have been drawn from meditation upon it. It is true it has suffered somewhat at the hands of the old translators, away back in King James' time. They used language that was harsh and rough, words that are not permissible in the polite parlance of to-day."
